BULGARIAN PARTY ORGAN'S REPORTS ON POLAND

AU221157 [Editorial Report] Sofia RABOTNICHESKO DELO in Bulgarian on 21 December 1981 carried on page 5 several reports on recent developments in Poland and reaction to them abroad. The page opens with a 900-word TASS report: "Decisive Measures Adopted by the Military Council of National Salvation." It refers to a communique issued by the Polish Ministry of Interior and dispatched through PAP on the situation in the country, where according to the communique "martial law is being observed along general lines" and the "curfew has been shortened in certain areas," but in other areas and enterprises, "however, this measure cannot be adopted since subversive 'solidarity' elements continue to provoke unrest." The report mentions that "'solidarity' criminals are blackmailing the authorities in a Katowice mine and are threatening to cause an explosion." Basing itself on the Polish Radio and on TRYBUNA LUDU and ZOLNIERZ WOLNOSCI, the report describes activities and statements by the KOS-KOR "anticommunists" Jacek Kuron and Karol Modzelewski, "who indefatiguably strive for the conflagration of fratricidal war in Poland in order to bring back capitalism." The rest of the report is devoted to Western reaction to Polish events, described as "actual interference in the country's domestic affairs." The report closes with a quotation from TRYBUNA LUDU: "Poland, however, is being gradually resurrected and is once more taking its worthy place in the fraternal family of the socialist community."

This report is followed by a 700-word BTA report from Warsaw, entitled "Life Normalizes," which describes improvements in the food supply and "restriction of the black market." This information is attributed to PAP and the Polish Radio. The BTA report cites an interview with the Polish minister of domestic trade on improvements in supplies and on "small Christmas presents prepared in the enterprises for the working people's children." It mentions improvements in coal production and the "general improvement of working discipline in enterprises and among the citizens," adding that "Warsaw citizens have gone out to clear the streets of snow." The report also mentions a meeting of the Democratic Party Presidium where "the political situation and economic conditions were discussed" and the "necessity of strictly observing the martial law regulations" was confirmed.

A 600-word report by Warsaw correspondent Angel Bonev entitled "Order and Calm Return" describes the situation in Warsaw and mentions cases of citizens' spontaneously expressing gratitude to the military and militia forces patrolling the streets. "Aktivists of party organizations in large Warsaw enterprises have voluntarily joined the military forces to assist them in maintaining public order," Bonev remarks. He cites the Polish Radio in reporting "street demonstrations in Gdansk where some people have been injured," adding that "irresponsible people tried to create disorder in Warsaw, as well but--here--the public did not support them." Bonev mentions the discovery of "documents in the headquarters of the so-called 'Trade Union' and of metal sticks filled with a special gas, made in the West." Bonev adds in this respect: "The counterrevolution has prepared well for an armed attack against the government and only the resolute intervention of the army prevented it from implementing its bloodthirsty intentions. The counterrevolution still hopes to retrieve its losses."

Bonev closes his report by describing the miners, railroad workers and other working people's effort to increase production and adds that "certain collectives have voluntarily prolonged their working days by several hours in order to produce more goods." He notes that "discipline is systematically improving" and that "after so many days of chaos, anarchy and arbitrariness, reassuring and gratifying reports and news are more and more frequently reaching us."

The last report on this page of RABOTNICHESKO DELO is a 2,000-word dispatch from New York by correspondent Georgi Todorchev, entitled "The Policy of Double Standards," which refers to U.S. President Reagan's recent press conference on current world events. According to Todorchev this press conference revealed "the two-faced political and moral standards of the White House, the subjectivism of political leadership in the United States and its criteria in conducting that country's foreign and domestic policy." Todorchev cites Reagan stressing the necessity "to render psychological support to Poland" and adds that the President "threatened to permanently ban food supplies to the Polish population by distorting the goals and intentions of the present Polish Government." The Bulgarian correspondent adds in this connection: "The President considered it appropriate to address drastic accusation to the Polish Government for the measures adopted in order to normalize life in the country and he made obviously premeditated attempts to shift the 'responsibility' for events in Poland onto the Soviet Union with expressions, opinions and appeals which could easily be interpreted as interference in the domestic affairs of another country." Todorchev then describes statements by Richard Perle, U.S. deputy undersecretary of state for defense, who reportedly said that "If the situation in Poland develops beyond certain limits, the United States will discontinue its trade relations with the USSR and interrupt the SALT talks." Todorchev quotes the CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR as saying that "It will depend on the level of resistance in Poland whether any measures against the Soviet Union should be adopted," and that "the Polish crisis may strengthen Reagan's position vis-a-vis Congress, when he demands an increase of military expenditures for 1983."

Todorchev adds that "political and ideological primitivism characterizes a number of official statements made these days in the United States." He quotes the WASHINGTON POST as noting "Reagan's attempts to blame the Soviets for the Polish crisis," and adds that "this actually fans anti-Polish and antisocialist hysteria among the monopolies' mass media." He further notes: "The screams of the emigres and extremists in this respect show an escalation since they have lost hope of bloodshed in Poland. It is a characteristic fact that the U.S. press passes over in silence, or plays down news and facts from Warsaw about a conspiracy against the government, and about the arming of subversive elements and their provocations, and that the U.S. press continues in editorials and commentaries to insinuate 'ideas' about sabotage and armed resistance against the government."

WOMAN'S IMAGE IN SOCIALIST LITERATURE CRITICIZED

West German Commentary

Bonn IWE-TAGESDIENST in German No 166, 12 Nov 81 'iwe-kultur' supplement

[Report from Berlin: "Criticism of Woman's Image in GDR Literature." A translation of the East Berlin SONNTAG article cited below follows this commentary]

[Text] East Berlin's literary historian Karin Hirdina sees "good reasons" for a "socialist feminism" in view of woman's image as portrayed in the literature of the GDR during the last 2 to 3 years. In many books by male authors women are only "something like stepping-stones on the road of the hero." There is a predominance of the "cliche of the emotional and sentimental woman," and it seems that the image men have of women is an "almost biological concept," as if it were the "nature" of the woman to be compliant, sympathetic and compassionate, mother and responsible for all warmth and humaneness in life. Books by female authors "all too frequently" contain "nothing but the reversal of patriarchally colored images of men and women." Books are populated with "feeble, somewhat dopey men, nothing more than silhouettes that can hardly be taken seriously." "Against their will," women who had been victimized by excessive demands "betrayed the goal of their longings: to feel secure under the protection of these scorned men." In reality they did not want their "freedom" at all. (SONNTAG 45/81)

GDR Scholar's Critique

East Berlin SONNTAG in German Vol 35 No 45, 8 Nov 81 p 4

[Summary of paper on 'The Women and the Literature of the GDR,' presented by Dr Karin Hirdina as main topic at Cultural League conference, sponsored by Central Commission on Literature, Leipzig, 6-7 November 1981: "The Difficulty of Saying I"]

[Text] The number of women writers in the GDR is remarkable. Anna Seghers and Christa Wolf--well, we have already grown accustomed to them, they are classics in our literature. But approximately since the middle of the 1970's many names have been added: Renate Apitz, Helga Koenigsdorf, Brigitte Martin, Beate Morgenstern, Doris Paschiller, Rosemarie Zeplin....The phenomenon is a sign of cultural progress: Progress in the emancipation of woman. And simultaneously: Never before has so much been written about the difficulties of this emancipation. By women themselves. A basic topic: the double burden on women between work and family. As has been the case in the past, women still feel responsible for the (private) reproductive sphere--the responsibility in society's production sphere has been added.

Has emancipation--once an area of new promises of happiness--become a burden? Do we, perhaps, need a socialist feminism? If we only consider the literature of the last 2 or 3 years (and they are the topic of this discussion), it appears that there are good reasons for it when one looks more closely at the picture created by male and female writers. Example: Erwin Strittmatter's "Wundertaeter" [Miracle Worker] Volume III. I have only one objection to his book: With respect to the characterization of women, Strittmatter does not go beyond cliches. His Buedner is loved by several women, all of whom exist only in reference to him, the man.

As happened already much earlier--in Dieter Noll's "Werner Holt"--women are something like stepping stones on the road of the hero (that was Guenter de Bruyn's biting satire at that time). Katharina, the practically gifted, naive soul. Sawade, the emancipated woman without any inclination for everyday things. And Rosa: Behind all appearances of emancipation (studies in Moscow, political experiences, own biography), the real person is revealed, "the adorable witch," "girlish, irresistible." In addition there is the atmosphere: the tamed jackdaw in front of the window during the night of love. The whole thing is on the borderline of kitsch.

Even more annoying: John Erpenbeck's "Der blaue Turm" [The Blue Tower]. The name of the main character is Bettina, who is telling the story in the first person. To make sure that everybody understands the richness of the reference of the name, she is portrayed as a romanticist, unreasonable. Her answer: "I would rather fail than become what you call reasonable. I hate your cold, analyzing, practical reason." It appears that it is gradually becoming fashionable here to denounce rationality and put in its place "human and warm" feelings. The romanticist's life is controlled by her feelings. The anonymity of modern scientific operations, pressure to produce--does not appeal to her. Goethe would probably have called her a "romantic nut." The bad thing about it: Erpenbeck seems to be serious, even when he insists that he also wants to show the dangers of the romantic lifestyle in his portrayal of Bettina. He uses the cliche of the sentimental and emotional woman to warn against the disappearance of feelings, against rationalistic-male bias. Nevertheless, even the language demonstrates painfully how a man envisions female feelings. The night with the lover: "The miracle happened, we really became one, he handled my body with strength and tenderness." The male claim to dominance is even apparent in the choice of words. It could present feminists of the purest conviction with a worthy tool for devastating polemics.

A third example: Erich Koehler's "Hartmut und Joana." Joana, the career woman, finally mayor, at liberty in the choice of her lovers, an example of a capable, emancipated woman, has lost all interest in poetry, human charity. Hartmut perishes. An "unnatural" woman. It seems as if in the minds of men women are almost pictured as biological beings. The "nature" of women is to be affectionate, intuitive and sympathetic, mother and in charge of all warmth and humanity in life. And: She lives, above all, in reference to man. She is like a mirror which has no substance until a man looks into it. These books contain very little evidence of a historical change in the image of patriarchal longings and norms, and, consequently, not much can be found about the real social conditions and conflicts under which women live in our society.

Therefore we need the statements by women themselves, their authentic experiences. But: after reading the most recent works by female authors I quickly gave up a tentatively adopted feminine position. All too often nothing else can be found but a mere reversal of patriarchically portrayed images of men and women. Actions are a result of revenge against the "male society." Weak, somewhat dopey men are populating the books, nothing but silhouettes that can hardly be taken seriously. Or--as an added pendant: The women, as victims of excessive demands, betray against their will the goal of their longings: to be secure in the care of one of these reviled men. In reality they do not want their "freedom" at all. Brigitte Martin's Edith, for instance ("Nach Freude anstehn" [Lining Up for Joy], bursts out saying: "Yes, I make all decisions myself and I do everything myself because I do not have a man who knows what he wants." Even the liberated woman is nothing but a victim. Even she sees herself as a mirror that has not substance--without a man.

The difficulty for women to determine their own selves. The frame of reference: the ordinary day, the private sphere. The behavioral demands within the family and the object-oriented, sober attitutdes in the working world do not go together. Interestingly, several female authors choose technical professions for their characters (Martin, Paschiller, Zeplin), where the contract between traditional and new demands on abilities is probably particularly apparent. But only the possibilities are there; the female authors are squandering opportunities of exploiting the severity of this conflict. Work outside the home only doubles the duties and demands, there is nothing in it that provides an opportunity to develop one's own potential, a prerequisite for real emancipation.

These books contain little about authentic work experience by women. There is no differentiation when it comes to the demands of gainful employment and the motivation exhibitied. It would certainly be different for someone who does assembly work than it is for the female scientist. (Maxi Wander's "Guten Morgen, du Schoene" [Good Morning, Beautiful] remains unequaled. There is also little mention of any expansion in communicative relations by working wormen. Only Doris Paschiller ("Die Wuerde" [Dignity]) places greater significance on social relations outside the family, connected with professional activities. Her book is a certain exception anyway. It deals with the problems in the lives of women, treating not only the dualism of a guilty men's world and an innocent women's world, but she shows how they are more or less interrelated. The marriage Paschiller tells us about is suffering from the inability of both partners to understand each other. Lack of communication and talking is a danger that can be experienced not only in marriage but also in social relationships outside this private sphere--that is her topic. It is an effort of delving into social problems instead of merely insulting men.

In our literature, the search of many women for their own selves, which no longer can only be a one-way mirror, often is still marked by a lack of freedom. The women are only victims, men are only villains. For a long time, however, women have been co-villains themselves, they reproduce cliches that have been handed down or they only reverse them. It seems to me that this literary trend is a "proper" variation of feminist bias. The dimension of history--presence--future has been lost, the mere stock-taking of empirical reality is dominating. The consequence, however, is a reduced stock-taking. Conflicts are becoming mere problems, problems get blown up into conflicts.

The exceptions: In "Kein Ort. Nirgends." [No Place. Nowhere.] and in her essays about the Guenderrode and Bettina von Arnim, Christa Wolf introduced philosophic-historic and world-historic dimensions. There is some sadness in the realization that the conflicts that are a product of history have not yet been solved and that emancipation has become a human task; only this dimension makes it possible to replace norms and relationships marked by claims to domination with others that are solidaric relationships--even between the sexes. Only the process of socialist-communist development will provide an opportunity to overcome the traditional division of labor and roles. The difficulty of saying I is not a woman's question.

The other exception: a male author. Guenter de Bruyn creates female characters who apparently are nothing else but the embodiment of patriarchal dreams. Elke in "Maerkische Forschungen" [Research in the Mark]--like Irene in "Preisverteilung" [Awarding of Prizes]--is a very "natural" woman: the center of the family, functioning within the responsibilities of the family atmosphere, the household, the children. But it is exactly this concept that is treated with irony by the author because it is the male viewpoint. Of course, De Bruyn feels that the characteristics are important that have been acquired by women while caring for the family: intuitiveness, common sense. But by tying these characteristics and demands only to the woman, the man will eventually become a comical character and suffer damage (as happened to Poetsch).

In world history, the problem of emancipation can only be solved in reference to women and men and also, it consists not only of a mere change of consciousness. If there is nothing but a lament about a condition, the consciousness of this task will be lost and literature will be satisfied with treating the symptoms.

DEMOGRAPHIC SITUATION ANALYZED IN LIGHT OF LATEST CENSUS

Impressions From Statisticians' Gathering

Belgrade DUGA in Serbo-Croatian No 199, 10 Oct 81 pp 14-15

[Text] An unprecedented demographic explosion is continuing. Last year there were 4.3 billion people living on our planet. There will be about 6 billion of them by the end of this century. What is the demographic situation in Yugoslavia? What are the principal problems of public policy in this area? What conclusions are suggested by this year's population census?

We sought answers to these questions in Novi Sad, where last week the regular annual meeting of Yugoslav statisticians and demographers took place. For 3 days the top experts from the entire country discussed reproduction of the Yugoslav population, i.e., births and deaths, changes in the population and changes in the age-specific composition--those things on which renewal of the entire population depends.

The basic conclusion of this meeting was expressed by Dr Milos Macura, member of the academy. Put briefly--renewal of the population in Yugoslavia has not been taking place as recorded in the relevant documents. That is, whereas the average length of life has been extended, and the mortality rate reduced or kept at the same level, the movement of the birth rate has been mixed. It has been in line with the expectation in Slovenia, Bosnia-Hercegovina, Macedonia and Montenegro, but it has been contrary to the expectation in Vojvodina, Croatia, and Serbia proper on the one hand, and in Kosovo on the other.

Adverse Trends

"For a quarter of a century now the net rate of reproduction in Serbia proper, Vojvodina and Croatia has been below the level necessary for reproduction of the population," Dr Macura said. "On the other hand in Kosovo that rate has dropped only slightly. These are extremely unfavorable trends from the demographic and social standpoint, and in Kosovo from the economic and humanitarian standpoints as well. After all, in one region we have depopulation and aging of the population on a large scale, while in another we have an overpopulation which is difficult to endure. Thus instead of the demographic differences diminishing, they have been increasing over the last 10 years."

What are the prospects for halting these adverse trends? Recent research conducted in regions with low fertility has shown that there are not many reasons for optimism. That is, not only are the women in these regions not planning a sufficient number of children, but their conception of the ideal family is not one which would ensure simple reproduction of the population!

In the words of Dr Gordana Todorovic, the opinions of married women are especially disturbing in Serbia proper and Vojvodina. In a survey they favored, in the language of averages, of course, a family of 2.21 and 2.28 children, respectively. Yet if simple reproduction is to be ensured under the present conditions of births and deaths, married women would have to give birth to an average of 2.5 children!

The measures taken in that direction up to now have not yielded the anticipated results. Dr Macura says:

"Amendments of the law on marriage, liberalization of abortion, extension of maternity leave and enlargement of the network of institutions for children--all these are necessary and worthwhile improvements. Nevertheless, they are only partial measures insufficient to essentially correct the situation. A large number of the causes of the low birth rate still persist: high unemployment, unfavorable housing conditions, unfavorable conditions for the creation and growth of the family, and so on."

Birth Control

There was quite a bit of discussion in Novi Sad about birth control as a method of family planning. Dr Gordana Todorovic made an interesting observation about how family planning differs from one part of Yugoslavia to another, but the result is the same--a low birth rate! She says:

"Whereas married women in Slovenia and Croatia prevent conception by contraception, women in Serbia and Vojvodina decide on abortion. About 80 percent of the pregnancies of married women in Slovenia end in a live birth. However, in Serbia less than 50 percent of the pregnancies of married women end in live birth, and almost exactly the same percentage end in abortion. We thus have a paradox: pregnancy taken to term is higher in Slovenia than in Serbia proper, though there are barely half as many conceptions there! There is no point in even talking about how harmful this 'model' held by women in Serbia and Vojvodina is."

Kosovo and parts of Macedonia stand in contrast to these regions; there people are still not sufficiently aware of the need for birth control. In the words of Olga Ivanova, the traditional social norms concerning marriage and the size of the family in Macedonia are expressed in the high number of births, specifically among the Albanian and Turkish populations. There is hardly any use of contraceptive devices, nor any limitation of the number of births. Ivanova says:

"In Macedonia the Albanian and Turkish populations have a higher natural increase. In opstinas with the highest representation of these groups the natural increase is also the highest. Tetovo, Gostivar, Kicevo, Struga, Kumanovo and Debar opstinas are typical in this respect."

The Problems of Kosovo

The drop in the birth rate in Bosnia-Hercegovina, Montenegro and Macedonia confirms the thesis of demographers that the birth rate drops during industrialization and rapid socioeconomic development. The changing of circumstances which have an effect on reproductive behavior have brought about a very rapid drop in the number of births in those regions. The drop in fertility has been especially rapid in Bosnia-Hercegovina.

Developments in Kosovo represent an exception to all this. Dr Macura explains:

"Kosovo has had slower economic development than the other regions and has been lagging behind them. That is why the gap between Kosovo and Slovenia, which is the most advanced region in the country, is almost 1:2 today. But that cannot be the reason why fertility in Kosovo is not declining at the necessary rate, since Kosovo has unquestionably experienced important changes in the economic structure, the social structure and the composition of the population. Normally such transformations would have to bring about a faster drop in the birth rate."

For the demographic conditions in Kosovo to change as they have elsewhere in the country, Dr Macura feels, the net rate of reproduction of its population ought to be about 25 percent lower than it is, judging by the experience of Bosnia-Hercegovina, Montenegro and Macedonia. But judging by the experience of the other regions, that rate ought to be all of 50 percent lower. Why isn't it?

"Since neither the large drop in the mortality rate, nor the relatively favorable socioeconomic factors have not calmed down the birth rate in Kosovo, we must assume that only conservative social forces could have brought about the persistence of the old model," Dr Macura said. "Those forces must have prevented the flow of information on up-to-date birth control, detracted from the importance of family planning and nurtured outdated social standards and an outdated ideology, acting through the institutions of religion, patriarchal family authority and in other ways."

Everyone Is Practicing Family Planning

The statisticians and demographers at the conference in Novi Sad also discussed a number of other interesting questions.

Dr Stane Krasovec, a member of the academy from Slovenia, for example, said that there has long been a fear among Marxists whenever the issue of family planning was raised. It is supposedly anti-Marxist to discuss that. But today even the Chinese are beginning to practice family planning, though, to be sure, it is presented as protection of the mother's health.

Dr Dusan Breznik, our prestigious demographer, said that the family of the future is a small family. ("Don't expect the man living on the 10th floor to have 5 children!") And further: the high birth rate is above all a question of people's education and awareness, since "the pill alone will not resolve humanity's problem."

Ante Novak, "the father of Yugoslav statistics," warned the statisticians present about the upcoming offensive by politicians. ("Imagine the pressure of the politicians on you! The speed at which you will have to work, the kind of data you will have to give! Preparation should be made for that offensive and erroneous interpretation of the data prevented by virtue of professional competence.")

The paper by Dr Alice Wertheimer-Baletic of Zagreb aroused polemical tones. She forecast that toward the end of this century Croatia will have a manpower shortage. There will be a shortage of about 80,000 workers!

The 3-day conference in Novi Sad is over. Dr Dusan Breznik, who chaired the conference, concluded:

"It is clear that there are none among us who do not wish humanity well. We all want people to live longer and for the death rate to be lower. However, when it comes to births, here we were unable to agree."

Interview With Ex-Director Novak

Belgrade DUGA in Serbo-Croatian No 199, 10 Oct 81 pp 15-16

[Interview with Ante Novak, former director of the Federal Bureau of Statistics, by Branko Vukovic: "Our Makeup Is Important"; date and place not specified]

[Text] [Question] The census has been taken, its first results are known and published. The official assessment is that the census succeeded beyond all expectation. What do you think?

[Answer] I think that on the basis of what we know so far it is very difficult to say whether this year's census has succeeded and to what extent. There is no question that the census of Yugoslavia as a whole is perfect. However, it is still an open question whether the data obtained in certain regions are altogether reliable. It would therefore be wise to wait for certain checks which should show the accuracy of the census data. Only then will we be able to make a competent assessment of the census.

[Question] There is a widespread belief that the statistics lie and that one should not put too much trust in them.

[Answer] The statistics do not lie, but lies are told by means of statistics. Unfortunately, this type of lie is still strongly manifested in our country. We therefore should require strict monitoring of statistical data.

[Question] The census results which have been published indicate that the basic elements of population policy are not being achieved.

[Answer] We have been warning for a long time that we need a well-thought-out population policy. Now we wonder what is going on with that policy. Do we have one at all? Like hell we have one! I am grateful to my colleagues in Ljubljana who denied the assertion that we have such a policy at least in Slovenia.

Unfortunately, a terrible "Marxist" prejudice still prevails everywhere in Yugoslavia: that these problems are resolved automatically and in and of themselves. And that is not true.

We have now come into a situation where it doesn't work anymore. The problems have grown to such a degree that they have become a serious hindrance to development. All the demographic events have become alarming. They warn us that if we do not make a radical change of direction immediately, we will have very grave conflicts and upheavals in the future.

[Question] Is the situation the same in the other socialist countries as well?

[Answer] The situation is not the same. That assertion that all the socialist countries are conducting the same population policy was made by a colleague back in 1973. Nonsense! I answered him by saying that he should see what our people are carrying into Romania and what they are bringing back. They were smuggling condoms in the direction of Bucharest and bringing back Gerovital! I don't know what the situation is now, since I am living in Ljubljana, but at that time the smugglers were doing a big business.

Policy Conducted Behind Closed Doors

[Question] Do we have enough public discussion of population policy?

[Answer] In a recent assembly I delivered a harsh attack on the way in which our population policy is conducted. Do you know what the politicians told me? "Consideration is after all given to this, it is just that nothing is said to the public." But I do not accept that kind of explanation. Excuse me, but I cannot abide a policy conducted behind closed doors! And what sort of political prejudice is it that does not allow discussion of the essential demographic issues?

[Question] Demographic developments are also showing up weaknesses in other special policies and not only population policy.

[Answer] Naturally. Take any policy you like, economic policy, housing policy, investment policy, health care policy, social welfare policy--they are all closely bound up with demographic trends.

Take investment policy. Had the comrades in Kosovo invested more in the manufacturing industry, they would have solved the problem of unemployment considerably more rapidly. There would then have been smaller emigration and less basis for the nationalistic outbreaks. We in Slovenia, on the other hand, have pushed the manufacturing industry, though we do not have manpower. That is why we now have 140,000 workers from other republics who have to be provided housing, health care, social welfare and so on. In Macedonia there was no polycentric investment policy, which is why they now have pressure on the cities and huge differences between the rural and urban areas. In Slovenia, however, where the pattern of investment was uniform, there are almost no backward villages. And so on. The linkage is obvious.

[Question] At the conference in Novi Sad you called attention to the fact that these trends can also in large part be affected by megalomania.

[Answer] The pressure and desire for there to be as many of us as possible date back a long way. At one time we asked when we would reach a population of 20 million. Today they are wondering in Macedonia when Skopje will become a city of 1 million inhabitants. Slovenian politicians ask when there will be 2 million of us in Slovenia. Perhaps it is difficult for them to remember anything but round numbers. But I ask: What does that bring us? That is primitivism! The important thing is the makeup and not the size of our population.

[Question] You advocate conscious and planned guidance of population?

[Answer] There is no other way. If we within the League of Communists and the Socialist Alliance lack a deliberate population policy, other forces do have one. Show me the church that does not have its own, and that a thoroughly deliberate population policy, its dogmas, its moral rules, its veto: "Do not have an abortion!" Do you suppose that the nationalistic forces do not have a population policy? "More children, as many children as possible, to increase our numbers!"

Take Kosovo. The statistics clearly show that the birth rate has been dropping just a bit, but the mortality rate has been dropping still faster, so that the natural increase is growing steadily. The credit for this can be given in large part to the Albanian nationalists, who have used the most perfidious means to augment the natural increase. "The more of us there are, the sooner we will create Great Albania!"

What have the organized social forces in Kosovo done in the field of family planning? Nothing! They have allowed the hodzas and the nationalists to launch the slogan: "As many children as possible!" And I love children, we all love children, but let us not exaggerate! Because of such an attitude we now have a situation where a portion of the population in Kosovo has objectively become a social and material burden. This results in basic differences in development, and here the principal factor is a demographic one, but it is being ignored in the current debates.

[Question] Can you explain that position in more detail?

[Answer] You see, according to the 1978 data the difference between Kosovo and Slovenia in terms of national income was 100:716. The people from Kosovo get excited: "The damned Slovenians have eaten up everything!" However, when the demographic factor is eliminated, this ratio becomes 100:448. In actuality the differences would be still smaller, since a portion of the forces would move from the area of consumption of national income into the area of creation of national income; that is, the consumer would become a producer.

Now, I can understand that worker in Ljubljana when he says: "I want to help, but let us make an agreement. If I have three children, then you have three, too, but not six, eight or 12. I want to give my children an education, too." Do not think that these facts are not taken into account in the common sense of our peasants and workers.

[Question] So, aid to Kosovo should be planned and organized?

[Answer] All the underdeveloped should be helped, not only Kosovo, but we must know in advance where that money is going. The help must be a function of our strategic goal which we wish to achieve. We know, for example, that at present the prices of certain products are lower in Pristina than in Belgrade or Split. Why? By what logic? Instead of teaching him to work, you are teaching him the opposite. There is a Chinese saying: "Do not give a hungry man a fish, but teach him to catch fish."

It is clear, then, that one of the things to do in seeking a way out is to lower the birth rate in Kosovo, since today it is the highest in Europe. I do not honor the argument that this touches upon someone's religious or moral convictions, since in essence these convictions are inherently political.

We Are All the Same in Loving Children

[Question] Some people explain the high growth rate by saying that certain nationalities have a traditional love of children.

[Answer] What next! This is a question of customs, dogmas, prejudices, primitivism and pressures, and is not because someone loves or does not love children. What will happen when population jeopardizes humanity's survival? Will we die of hunger because someone "loves children"?

[Question] One Kosovo author, Dr Musa Limani, regards the thesis that the natural population increase is having an adverse effect on economic development is anti-Marxist.

[Answer] I have not read that. However, this position, consciously or unconsciously, signifies a nationalistic position. Is it un-Marxist if we regulate haphazard processes by deliberate measures? If we have too little food, will we go ahead and raise the birth rate? What will that kind of "Marxist" do when population threatens our survival? These are all common sense questions we must be mindful of, even if someone tells us 100 times that we are anti-Marxists, neo-Malthusians and the like.

[Question] You have advocated what is referred to as a differentiated population policy.

[Answer] Our basic goals are to reduce the rate of natural increase and to diminish the large demographic differences from one region to another, and that necessitates a differentiated population policy. Where the natural increase is higher, it needs to be restricted. In regions where the natural increase is lower, it needs to be encouraged.

The basic contradictions have been manifested within SR [Socialist Republic] Serbia, where the differences between Kosovo and Vojvodina are huge. In future it is here that the main battle will be waged to normalize the birth rate and the rate of natural increase.

[Question] How is the rate of natural increase to be reduced?

[Answer] First of all, if we are to conduct a uniform policy, we must first make the individual and the masses aware, eradicating bad habits and preserving good ones. We will not achieve anything if we anathematize the woman who has given birth to 10 children, not even if we expel her husband from the League of Communists. No sort of practicalistic measures, especially coercion, can help.

The most important thing is to create a general climate of trust and tolerance. Every man and every woman must understand family planning, contraception, abortion, and so on. If we give support in that respect to the progressive forces in Kosovo, then the processes we have been speaking about will take a different course. Moreover, it is worth remembering that it is possible to act rather quickly and effectively in the realm of ideology, but changing morality and customs is a terribly slow process.

[Question] We are paying a high price for having neglected these issues so long.

[Answer] Mistaken strategic moves made in a society's development do not take their revenge immediately. We Yugoslav communists, and here I make no exception for even the highest leadership, have a bad habit of frequently putting off the resolution of burning issues. Our thinking is to let the issue ripen, later we will take care of it, we have more urgent business, and so on. The ordinary man understands this more quickly than so-called thinking people, since he is first to be hit in the head with the problem.

Forebodings in Serbian Assembly

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1610, 8 Nov 81 pp 17-19

[Article by Teodor Andjelic: "Population and Policy"]

[Text] For that small group of those who really know, the demographic crisis in Yugoslavia has lasted for a quarter of a century already. But only last week, in the assessment of the specialists--did a political body for the first time with real seriousness and in public--at times even in dramatic tones--discuss population policy, which for all practical purposes does not exist in most of Yugoslavia.

The reference is to the debate in the Assembly of SR Serbia and to the truly initial conversations concerning the way in which population is reproduced in that republic. In that republic (without the provinces), as indeed in most of the country, a process has been going on for 22 years at whose conclusion, should everything continue as up to now, "we must expect a disturbance to occur in the reproduction and composition of the population somewhere in the mid-21st century which cannot be otherwise described than catastrophic."

This is literally what is written in the study that was the point of departure for the debate in the assembly. This analysis was prepared by Dr Bogoljub Stojanovic, Dr Miroslav Macura, Tripo Mulina, Dr Miroslav Rasevic and Milos Macura, member of the academy, who was the editor. We immediately asked him to explain the meaning of the word "catastrophic."

Dr Milos Macura says that the situation is similar in Croatia and in Vojvodina. Should the current demographic process continue, those regions and Serbia proper would perhaps have even a 30-percent smaller population than today in the year 2050. And, what is particularly essential, that population would consist mostly of elderly people.

"Such a society," Dr Milos Macura said, "would not be able to perform its basic functions."

Eight Birth Rates

In the demographic sense Yugoslavia is the world in small, but with three important differences: our population is multiplying considerably more slowly than the world population, in which declining fertility, which is reaching the low European level, has the decisive role; second, the demographic differentiation of our republics and provinces is altogether different from the planetary differentiation; and finally, none of our regions has experienced the negative natural increase which has occurred in recent years in Europe.

There are several facts about what is called differentiation: Kosovo, as the only region with a very rapid demographic growth, has a share of only 7 percent in the population of Yugoslavia; Bosnia-Hercegovina, Macedonia and Montenegro, as sections with a growth that is slowing down, have a share of 30 percent;

Serbia proper, Croatia, Slovenia and Vojvodina, where growth is slow, comprise 63 percent of the population of Yugoslavia.

Differences from one political-administrative division to another in the birth rate and death rate are especially important, and they have been changing over the last three decades.

The number of live births was the highest in 1952--500,000, but since that time there has been a steady decline, reaching 381,000 in 1979.

The highest number of deaths (270,000) was recorded in 1951; by 1966 that number had dropped to 180,000, and then by 1979 it had risen to 191,000.

Thus the natural increase of Yugoslavia's population has dropped in 27 years from 302,000 to 190,000 people. The rate of natural increase has dropped most in Vojvodina (to one-fourth), in Croatia and Serbia proper (a drop of 2.9-fold), and then in Bosnia-Hercegovina and Montenegro (2.6- and 2.1-fold), while the drop has been moderate in Macedonia and Slovenia (1.8- and 1.6-fold, respectively), and altogether slight in Kosovo (a drop of 5 percent). It is interesting, however, as we were told by Dr Dusan Breznik, director of the Center for Demographic Research of the Institute of Social Sciences in Belgrade, that according to their surveys, for example, the number of conceptions is almost identical in Vojvodina and Kosovo.

Birth Control

Under "conditions of the full possibility of birth control" countries are rare in Europe where the so-called rate of reproduction is holding the level adequate to renew the population in the long run. In Yugoslavia that rate has been maintained only in Slovenia.

Bosnia-Hercegovina, Macedonia and Montenegro seem to completely confirm, in an almost textbook way, the classical demographic hypothesis concerning the declining pattern of the birth rate during industrialization and urbanization.

But Kosovo is an exception to this tendency. In that region fertility first rose and then showed a slow decline.

Dr Milos Macura says that Kosovo has also indubitably experienced important transformations of the economy, the population and society. "Such transformations would normally have had to result in a faster drop of the birth rate," Dr Macura says.

"Had demographic conditions been changing like others in the country, at Kosovo's present level of development the net rate of reproduction of its population ought to have been about 25 percent less than what it is judging by the experience of Bosnia-Hercegovina, Macedonia and Montenegro and all of 50 percent less judging by the experience of the other regions. Since neither the large drop in the death rate, nor the relatively favorable socioeconomic factors have been able to essentially alter reproductive behavior and slow down the birth rate," Dr Milos Macura said, "we must assume that only conservative social forces could have tended to conserve the old model of reproduction of the population. They must have prevented the flow of information, reduced to a minimum the importance of family planning and nurtured outdated social standards and ideology, acting through the institutions of religion and patriarchal family authority."

Unprecedented

If current processes in Kosovo continue, by the year 2000 its population density would attain that of Great Britain, one of the most densely populated countries in Europe. Incidentally, the situation in Europe is now as follows: the number of new births is far below the level necessary to renew the population only in Albania and Ireland; 9 countries are slightly above that level, including the Soviet Union, thanks to the large number of newborn infants in the Asian republics; in the other 16 countries this number has for shorter or longer periods been below the level, and in at least 4 countries the annual number of births is below the number of deaths, so that the natural increase is negative.

Yugoslavia's Demographic Crisis

The European situation is also very important to Yugoslavia, since a majority of the European countries--and this can soon be expected in the major portion of our country--are conducting an explicit policy to encourage the birth rate. The methods related to that policy are in principle constructive, and only in exceptional cases are they restrictive (for example, in Romania and Bulgaria, where abortions and contraceptives are restricted to a considerable extent).

The policy of rehabilitation of the birth rate is older than the policy of reducing the birth rate. But it seems that the younger of these two policies is more important to most of the world. Naturally, because of a singular precedent throughout history: the world population increased from 2.5 to 4.4 billion over the last 30 years.

Postwar history seems to have pointed up the fact that in our final calculation even population cannot grow infinitely. In answer to our question about a possible natural, biological selection that would bring the size of the population into line with the planet's capabilities, Dr Dusan Breznik answered:

"I do not put any stock at all in such theories. And I especially don't take seriously those scholars who see a way out of the demographic explosion in genetic self-regulation of the human species."

Yet different groups of scholars offer differing answers to the new situation that has come about. One of the extreme positions--that a smaller population might be desirable--is defended by certain leading figures in the natural sciences. Within the science of demography there are also serious views to the effect that a negative growth is not catastrophic, but it appears that the prevailing view among the specialists is that the birth rate needs to be maintained at the level of simple reproduction of the population, and that not so much because of the size of the population, but primarily in order to avoid paralysis of society because of the tremendous number of elderly people.

Dr Milos Macura told us that the working group which had done this study for the Executive Council of the Assembly of Serbia had calculated which is more expensive: youth or old age? And they calculated that the social benefits for old age are threefold greater than possible expenditures for the policy to support the birth rate.

The Third Child

Today the burden of reproduction of the population has mostly been left to the family. All the costs of children are borne for a number of years mostly by the parents themselves. Let us add to that unemployment and the chronic housing crisis. One does not need to be very wise or highly educated to understand why we are reproducing ourselves at a low level! The fruits of "pleasure in poverty" may become, and are, very expensive!

The "Program of Measures To Support the Birth Rate" of that working group, attributes particular importance to the policy of family supplements. They need to be radically reformed; family supplements ought to cover all the expenses of children--costs which have not been socialized in one way or another. And, above all, the entire policy should be centered on the third child.

If our population is to be able to reproduce itself, it is indispensable that all women give birth to an average of 2.15 children. Since some of them do not wish this or cannot, the actual average is somewhat higher than 2.5 children.

All in all, taking into account the truly complicated series of different and mutually intertwined factors, the basic condition for simple reproduction of the population is the third child.

But in most of Yugoslavia today the predominant pattern is the one-child family, and according to the study of the working group, the number of children which parents want to have is smaller among almost all age groups of women than the ideal number of children for reproduction of the population. There is an exception in the older age groups of women (between the ages of 40 and 50) who naturally desire a number of children higher than the ideal. The ideal measure is this: 1,000 daughters for every 1,000 women. Here again the situation is extreme in Kosovo, where the average woman gives birth to two daughters.

The decline of the birth rate is a natural phenomenon which has occurred in every advanced country in the 20th century. But our society seems to have omitted to grapple with that pattern at the right time. The suggestions for conclusions of the debate in the Serbian Assembly include the following: "The population density and the set of natural conditions for conduct of economic activity and for living do not at all require that the population be restricted at its present size. However, in view of the depth of the decline of the birth rate and the tendency for it to decline further, it seems reasonable for simple reproduction to be established for the present as the optimum goal of population policy, which is a condition for avoiding all the far-reaching and unnecessary consequences in the future."

[Box, p 17] Yugoslavia and Kosovo

In the period from 1952 to 1979 Kosovo's contribution to the natural population increase of Yugoslavia increased from 22,000 to 41,000 (from 8 to 22 percent); the absolute contribution of Bosnia-Hercegovina, Macedonia and Montenegro dropped from 120,000 to 78,000; and the contribution of the other regions has been dropping in both absolute and relative terms. Within that framework, the "contribution" of Serbia proper has dropped from 73,000 to 37,000 (from 25 to 17 percent).

The differing rate of change of the mortality rate plays an important role in all this. It has been particularly rapid in the economically less developed regions. There the number of deaths was lower in 1979 than in 1952 by all of 20,000. In the other regions this number was 13,000 higher because of the aging of the population.

This very fact is a cause of differentiation: extending the length of life signifies an important reserve for the natural population increase, which in time is exhausted and then disappears altogether as the population grows older. But the number of new births has a very important role in differentiation of the natural population increase. Everywhere it has been dropping, but at different rates. The only exception is Kosovo; there the number of live births was 30 percent higher in 1979 than in 1952, though the birth rate dropped from 44.7 to 32.1 per 1,000 inhabitants.

In the postwar period the population of all parts of Yugoslavia has been growing all the while. To be sure, at a different pace and at differing rates which are dropping at a differing pace.

STIPE SUVAR CITES CRITICS OF COMMUNIST PAST

Belgrade BORBA in Serbo-Croatian 19 Nov 81 p 9

[Article by V. Vignjevic]

[Text] A conference was held today in the Section of the Federal Conference of the SAWPY for Education, Science, Culture, and Physical Education concerning the theme "Culture and Art in the Preservation of the Traditions of the Revolution." A number of cultural and public workers, as well as creative artists from all over the country, participated in this extremely interesting discussion, which was organized by this Section and by the Association of Cultural and Educational Communities of Yugoslavia.

"The preservation of the traditions of the revolution is an organized and very complex ideopolitical, cultural, and educational social activity which has its source in the revolution and which strives to give it a more genuine continuity," stressed Djordje Radisic, president of the Cultural and Educational Communities of Serbia, in his introductory report.

Emphasizing that this, the jubilee year of the uprising and the revolution has provoked this type of discussion in our country, Mladen Oljaca has supported the more precise establishment of the problems of all organized socialistic forces in implementing cultural policy. It has not been defined everywhere, especially in the manner set forth in the Resolution of the XI Congress of the LCY concerning the transformation of culture as part of the self-management process.

Having made two methodological observations, the first that one must be against the possible over-glorification of the approach to this subject, and the second that it is of value to avoid too narrow of a comprehension of culture and art, and to understand that the People's Liberation Struggle in its entirety was also a powerful cultural revolution, Comrade Stipe Suvar said the following:

"In literature, history, and sociology, a few theses of the petit bourgeois, the reactionary consciousness, have predominated in the treatments of our socialistic movement and struggles. Some representatives of the intelligentsia also promote these arguments; they say that the People's Liberation Struggle offered some verse, or some clamour, and nothing more. Or, they give another thesis which refers to Stalinism, treating it as the "original sin" of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia before the war and during the revolution, and not just after liberation, which resulted from the conflicts in the literary left and from the Information Bureau. Even today, thousands of voices (of both the left and the right) argue loudly against this thesis. This is worth explaining, first of all, from the point of view that no left, which is not in the League of Communists, interests us, except as a petit bourgeois, radical opponent. If we follow the most widespread literary ideas which are in vogue in the young generation, these theses predominate, as well as the opinion that here, in this country, all creative people are persecuted today."

In the same line of thinking are also the theories concerned with the "poetry of resistance," with the redemption, for example, of Goran and Nazor "to atone for the sins of the rebels." This is nicely explained to us in literary gatherings in honor of the jubilee. These are subtle theses, but better suited for limited use in other countries; a modest export of trivial spiritual trappings. We must prove, contrary to these theses, that this so-called resistance, actually poetry during the revolution, with all of its plebian creators, was the destruction of the old world, and at the same time, our spiritual struggle. This means that we must consider the People's Liberation Struggle and the revolution as something which has not been completed; indeed, it still goes on, both today and tomorrow," said Suvar.

In addition to the greater number of written contributions, Prvoslav Ralic, Predrag Golubovic, Tome Momirovski, Ivan Potrc, and others also participated in the discussion. Although no conclusions have been made, on the basis of all the reports (and the dialogue concerning the same subject will be continued at the beginning of next year), one gets the impression that there remain quite a number of problems connected with this area which have not yet been sufficiently addressed, both from the political and the cultural point of view. And, it has become apparent that in that great task which still lies ahead of us the greatest burden must fall not only on the organizers of this meeting, but also on all other organized socialistic forces in our country.

ORTHODOX PAPER PROTESTS EQUATING VELIMIROVIC WITH STEPINAC

Belgrade PRAVOSLAVLJE in Serbo-Croatian 1-15 Aug 81 p 4

[Article by Dr Atanasije Jevtic: "Who Benefits From Leveling?"]

[Text] Under the department "Pretexts" OSLOBODJENJE of Sarajevo published on 7 July 1981 an article by the editor in chief Ljubisa Jaksic entitled "The Cleronationalists--Against Their Own Peoples," which is actually a commentary on the speech of Branko Mikulic delivered at Tjentiste on 4 July (see OSLOBODJENJE for 5 July).

It is neither "cleronationalism" nor "cleronationalist" (the names themselves are enough to show that we have nothing to do with this) which have brought us to take up that article and its pretext here, but the leveling we are familiar with and which has been consistently applied to us according to a criterion and method which need to be deliberately reassessed once again for the sake of the truth and for the benefit of history, both past and future.

After all, how otherwise is one to understand when the Orthodox people's brotherhoods of zealots and communities of peaceable and apolitical believers from among Serbian peasants and workers, who have nothing against them except supposedly their religious and ethnic identity, are compared to and equated with movements and associations which are not that, or which perhaps, precisely because of other charges, would in fact like such leveling? How, to go further, is one to understand when people like Archbishop Alojzije Stepinac and the Bishop of Zica Nikolaj Velimirovic are compared and equated at the same stereotyped level of the "war criminal"? We are neither thinking nor speaking here about the former, but in the name of historical truth we cannot but protest against placing the latter in the now stereotyped category of the "war criminal" solely because in his ideology he was an anticommunist, or, more accurately, an antitheist. (Among other things, there is the fact that during his internment in Vojvodina he rejected a German demand that he sign a condemnation of the communists, saying that the church can judge only atheism.) This kind of cheap political leveling neither serves the truth, nor, we are witnesses, does it yield desirable results, since it does not look the problems straight in the eye.

In his hallucinations of the horror that is to come from the "effects of this kind of organization of Orthodox believers," i.e., of Orthodox zealots (who, let us recall, began to "organize" during the sufferings on the Salonika front and in subsequent tribulations), the newsman Lj. Jaksic mentions the alleged "war-criminal biography" of Bishop Nikolaj, but he does not know, or refuses to know, that Nikolaj's biography was better known to the Serbian zealots than he thinks. After all, there is probably no Orthodox Serb or other man in our country or in the world who does not know that Nikolaj spent 4 entire years of the war in German prisons and camps (Ljubostinja, Rakovica, Vojlovica, Vienna and Dachau), together with the Serbian Patriarch Gavrilo Dozic, and accordingly was neither a "war criminal," nor could he have had a "war-criminal" biography. For any normal human understanding there is probably a difference between a man who was immediately confined by the occupier, imprisoned and finally taken off to the camp at Dachau along with the head of his church, and others who freely carried on their deeds and their misdeeds under the fascists. (The fact that Patriarch Gavrilo returned to Yugoslavia after the notorious camp at Dachau, while Nikolaj did not is a matter of personal choice which does not justify his being labeled a "war criminal.")

Pious Serbian believers and their patriarchs and bishops like Nikolaj was did not have, nor did they create Dachau nor Jasenovac, common graves or forcible conversions, but along with their people they did indeed experience and survive them, if indeed they did survive. If their only "sin" was, or is even today, that they were and are men of living Orthodox faith, men who are opposed to having another theistic or atheistic faith or ideology imposed on them, then it truly is a falsification and shameless act to attribute to them a nonexistent "war-criminal biography." This language of calculated leveling (on the basis of which two Serbian priests were recently sentenced each to 6 years in prison) not only does not contribute to a sober confrontation of the truth, but casts a cloud and a shadow on clear examination of him who is a criminal and of him who is not a criminal even more than does the difference in religious, ideological, political and human conceptions.

If it is a question of discussing the truth, we are prepared to continue such a discussion with everyone who desires the truth.

STATUS OF AUTONOMOUS PROVINCES WITHIN SERBIA ARGUED

[Article by Stevan Niksic: "Scholars Discuss the Provinces"]

[Text] Last week's discussion in the Political Science Association of SR [Socialist Republic] Serbia concerning the political system of SR Serbia and relations between the republic and the provinces began with an observation made by the association's president, Dr Radoslav Ratkovic, professor, to the effect that this is a "major historical problem." It is a problem whose background includes the activity, actions and motives of former generations, one which is of interest to the present generation, and one whose resolution will have an effect on future generations, Ratkovic observed, and he advocated that as many people as possible become involved in discussions of this kind. It was unfortunately obvious that this would remain no more than a fond wish, at least on this occasion. Representatives of the corresponding associations from the provinces, who had been invited, did not respond to the invitation to participate in the discussion. More accurately, the Political Science Association of SAP [Socialist Autonomous Province] Kosovo sent one of its members, who did attend, but said nothing, and no one came from the Vojvodina association.

Agreement was reached on the assessment that relations between the republic and the provinces are in every respect a Yugoslav topic, and this thesis had many advocates at this meeting.

Asymmetrical Federalism

In his introductory address on the topic of the government and self-management in the context of the principal topic Ratkovic pointed to the frequent tendency to ignore the fundamental constitutional provisions in which the republics and provinces are clearly distinguished. He also expressed the opinion that the limits of the constitution have actually been exceeded already by certain extreme interpretations of this kind and that one can therefore speak of attempts to revise it. A similar opinion was expressed by Dr Miodrag Visnjic, in whose judgment implementation of the constitution is showing that the system of communications and relations in which the provinces figure as an element of federalism has been institutionally built up and developed in practice far more than one in which they are an integral part of SR Serbia. "Perhaps this is a logical consequence of development of the provinces up to 1968, and especially up to 1971, when they developed predominantly as an integral part of SR Serbia, though in a particular way and to a particular degree the component of their presence in the Federation was also well known," Visnjic observed, thereafter, having reflected for a moment, adding: "But then again perhaps it is not logical"!

Dr Jovan Djordjevic, professor, spoke among other things about asymmetrical federalism. He used this term to describe a federalism which "favorizes only one partner and deprives the other of autonomy."

History shows that asymmetrical federalism quickly turns into hegemony of one participant or into separatism of the other, Djordjevic says. And he then added: "The contradictory nature and unwiseness of asymmetrical federalism in Yugoslavia have been retained under the influence of various overt and covert tendencies from 1971 up to the well-known Kosovo events. Aside from implementation or nonimplementation of the SFRY Constitution and the Constitution of SR Serbia, we must also single out among these tendencies the political and mental climate which has fragmented the country's ethnic structure and contributed to the constant inclusion of autonomy in the orbit of federalism since 1971."
Dr Borislav Jovic recalled that the provinces do not have equal economic rights with the republics. "I am not on this occasion going into the question of whether this is a good solution, but am speaking of this as a fact," he said. "The provinces cannot have any greater interest in integration within Serbia, except for a possible emotional interest, than the interest it has in collaborating with the Yugoslav economy as a whole. However, it is a fact that there are strong forces toward disintegration at the Yugoslav level, forces which are pulling toward autonomy, toward economic separatism in those republics and consequently in the provinces as well."

Jovic sees the roots of economic separatism and autarky above all in the "profound contradiction between the social character of the means of production and the group-ownership character of appropriation of the results of labor." He sees the solution to the problem of the "unity of Serbia" solely in strengthening the spirit of community in Yugoslavia as a whole, and he feels that only in this way is it possible to find the key to the economic troubles which are at the same time the cause of many other troubles.

The Roots of Separatism

Dr Zivojin Rakocevic, professor, spoke on the same topic in a somewhat different manner, debating to some extent with Jovic. That is, he feels that the problem does not lie exclusively in the so-called "group-ownership tendencies" as against the social character of income, but that it goes much deeper and concerns certain contradictions which arise out of the system itself and out of inconsistencies in adhering to the principle adopted long ago concerning the operation of economic laws under socialism. After having presented the opinion (which he called "heretical") that there never did exist a unified Yugoslav market in the true sense of the word, Ratkovic observed that the policy of destatization and debureaucratization, set forth in the LCY Program, has been implemented very contradictorily and with fluctuations. "Although the 1961 and 1965 reforms did not signify any major breakthroughs in this sense, we were quick to abandon them and throw up our hands, since we did not have the nerves to persist on that reform course.

"Hasn't the problem of Vojvodina as a province within Serbia actually taken on more weight because socialism has been warring unceasingly with agriculture. It cannot abide agriculture via facti, which is why it failed to solve the problem of commodity production, of the market, of establishing relations with the world.... What is it that has recently been motivating the comrades in Vojvodina to put unceasing questions about compensation, the prices of farm products, and so on, and to wage a bloody fight for this? I have called the attention of some of them to the fact that this is a very one-sided approach and in the long run will not yield favorable results. But is this not the origin of the aspirations to exceed even the boundaries which have been postulated in legal and political terms in the Constitution of SR Serbia? Or, Kosovo. Isn't the problem of the advanced and the underdeveloped in the background of everything? Can we then ask whether we ourselves have found exactly the most appropriate solutions to that problem, which is perhaps the greatest problem of the age," Ratkovic said.

Eight Parties

Noting that a moment of crisis has now come in Yugoslav society, Dr Vladan Cetkovic, professor, said that the basic issue today is not only the question of the relations between the republic and the provinces, between republics and republics, but--"whether under present conditions we can produce and exist in the way we have been producing and existing up to now or must something change in that respect"? In his opinion, this has become the central issue for the Yugoslav public and it is the task of scholars, among others, to undertake an exploration for solutions "to everything which obviously does not work any longer the way it worked up to now."

In his participation in the discussion Dr Balsa Spadijer, professor, spoke in particular about the "confederalist tendencies" in the League of Communists, which, he said, are emerging "under the strong pressure of centers of political power which have become independent." "It is clear that the tendency toward confederalization of the League of Communists is tending to break it apart. At one time were witnesses of creation of all but a kind of multiparty system of a particular type in which six or eight parties, or the elites of those parties, enter into compacts, agreements or conflicts. Everything that happened in Kosovo indeed demonstrates that this tendency is one that should not be neglected." In Spadijer's opinion, the reason for all this is not the exclusive copying of the system of decisionmaking by government bodies and agencies, but that the role of the state has again become strong and the League of Communists is again beginning to lean in that direction. For years, Spadijer said, we have advocated separation of the League of Communists from the government, and in that we did succeed, but the question is whether we also separated the structures of the League of Communists from the functioning of the system of government to the extent we desired?

Speaking about democratic centralism, Spadijer emphasized that ideological unity is one of its principles and that "ideological confederalism in the LCY" is by contrast now being manifested seriously. "We can ask ourselves today on what issues there is a unified ideology and on what issues there are very serious ideological differences as a consequence of federalistic of confederalistic tendencies in the LCY which are tolerated at the moment?"

In the same context Spadijer also spoke about the danger presented by tendencies to strengthen bureaucratic centralism, which in his opinion are the consequence of an erroneous definition of the positions and the independence of the leagues of communists of the republics and provinces.

Milivoje Draskovic spoke about the "pronounced tendency" for the provinces (at any price) and "in every possible respect" to put themselves on a par with the republic and in this way to insist on a kind of "emancipation" of the provinces from SR Serbia. It was his judgment that "aspirations of this kind may among other things be an expression of a primitive separatism." Where does such a strong desire for statehood come from? asked Dr Radivoje Marinkovic, professor. This shows, he believes that the self-management dimension is declining in importance in real relations. But Marinkovic relates this at the same time to something which he referred to as "the domination of the political sphere over the economy." Since domination of the political sphere over the economy is secured through government and political power, it is logical, in his opinion, for everything to "revolve" around how the government power is to be distributed.

An Organization of Conspirators

Milan Vujicic advocated a somewhat different approach in this discussion, taking the view that the problem of relations between the republic and the province is above all a problem of the relations between the "whole and the parts" in the political system of Yugoslavia and that in broader terms who can speak about "partialization" of the parts within the framework of larger systems, of the parts "holding up in bunkers," from the OOUR [basic organization of associated labor] on up. He mentioned the example of JAT [Yugoslav Air Transport] (the organization in which he works) where, he says, "there is no responsibility whatsoever toward the common cause in earning income at the level of the work organization." Dr Miodrag Perovic expressed the opinion that delegations of SR Serbia, SAP Kosovo and SAP Vojvodina in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces of the SFRY Assembly ought to establish more direct links and enter into agreement when issues come up that are of interest to the republic as a whole.

At the end, speaking as the last participant in this discussion, Dr Dragomir Draskovic, taking the events in Kosovo as his point of departure, attempted to draw certain fairly general conclusions. "Not a single meeting of the LCSe [League of Communists of Serbia] Central Committee has actually raised the question of democratic centralism, nor was it raised, as you know by the 21st Meeting of the LCY Central Committee either. I do not object to the arguments that the League of Communists has become governmentalized and that there are tendencies toward and a practice of ossifying the idea of the state, but that is not all. The League of Communists is under attack from within, an attack being aimed at separating it from the working class and the people. It is under attack by a type of conspiratorial organization whose nature is very difficult to discuss ...," Draskovic said.

The discussion in the Political Science Association of SR Serbia was by all appearances only one of many similar discussions on the topics of the present moment in politics which will be conducted this fall. In a few days a discussion is also to be held in the Marxist Center of the LCSe Central Committee where the topic of the relation between the republic and the provinces will again be discussed. But, as on this occasion, that will not be the only topic under discussion.

DEFENDERS OF SENTENCED POET DJOGO ASSAILED

Sarajevo SVIJET in Serbo-Croatian No 1223, 9 Nov 81 p 4

[Commentary by Enver Dizdar: "A Question for Grandchildren"]

[Text] Our editorial board has received an extremely illegible copy of a letter headed "To be specific: A few questions for the comrade-newspapermen," signed with the name of Ilija Moljkovic. We shall not be publishing the letter, since it is unreadable from a variety of standpoints. However, inasmuch as the author remarks that he has sent it to a large number of weekly Yugoslav publications, we do not doubt that it will be available to readers for inspection. In any case, we ought to note that the letter addresses Stevan Stanic of NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE and the undersigned, Enver Dizdar, in connection with--what else?--"Woolly Times" and Gojko Djogo. The last sentence of Moljkovic's text reads as follows:

"Comrade Stanic, Comrade Dizdar, and the other comrade-newspapermen who helped to indict and sentence Djogo, it is now your word and God's word..." No more, no less.

All right, let comrade Moljkovic carry on. It only he were the only one. But little by little, and more and more frequently, new threads of "Woolly Times" are being spun. They are being spun on wobbly looms and battlefields [play on words of similar origin] of calculatedly imaginary anxiety for the freedom of what a writer has said, written down, thought, "sacred" as it is, "above life" as it is, "beyond any possibility of guilt and therefore out of the reach of justice." There he is, the most holy, the most honored, the god who is not subject to any human law--the litterateur.

KNJIZEVNE NOVINE (to mention only the latest threads of Djogo's wool) devotes the last 6 pages of its most recent issue to documents from the trial of Gojko Djogo. In order to provide "readers with a fuller insight into the nature of this case," KNJIZEVNE NOVINE prints the text of the indictment, extracts from the concluding speech of Gojko Djogo, and the text of the substantiation from the verdict, from which (of course!) the poems for which Djogo was on trial are omitted whenever they are cited in the document in their entirety. Comment, it would seem, is unnecessary.

Momo Kapor [popular novelist] has also gotten caught up in this, in an interview that he gave to the Belgrade weekly [actually biweekly] ZUM REPORTER. Since we assume that the same people do not read both our periodical and ZUM REPORTER, we shall cite what Kapor was asked and what he answered.

"ZUM REPORTER: 'Literature has obtained readers and interpreters of a new sort--the courts. What is your comment on this "literary" phenomenon?'

"Kapor: 'I am truly astounded by any judge who, by pronouncing an unjust punishment on a writer, will remain forever registered in the history of Serbian literature. Myself, I would not dare. After all, it is uncomfortable to survive until the time when grandchildren return from school and ask grandfather why a poet had been sentenced in 1981 for writing poetry. What can the grandchildren be answered? To be specific, grandchildren lack understanding for the demands of the current political situation of 50 years earlier, for complicated political relations, accidents of circumstances, and all the rest. Grandchildren expect grandfathers to be infallible and courageous, and not to succumb to anybody's pressures. I do not know how the grandchildren of that Belgrade mayor, the one who exiled Tin Ujevic [a penniless poet] to Imtoski under guard [during the interwar era], felt. Probably they did not have an easy time of it at school. Perhaps they changed their surname to shake off the traces of their shame. To sentence a poet for writing poetry is the same as killing a pigeon on a public square. Anyone can do that, but not everyone will. Naturally, so as not to remain in the sphere of metaphor, let me say that I am referring to the poet Gojko Djogo. I am compelled to say this at this moment because perhaps someone else, soon, will have to say it on my behalf or on behalf of my friends."

If things were as Momo Kapor and his like-minded fellows describe them, we would welcome their "infallibility and courage" (even so, we really do regard them as "brave" indeed). But things are not that way, surely not. They know that well themselves. They well know, being intelligent people, all the ways in which hostility to someone or something can be expressed and manifested. They also know that poetry can be a vehicle and weapon of hatred, not just of love. Why should poetry be immuned from such a capability? Or perhaps they think that poetry is so supernuman that a person cannot judge it? Let us say, in any case, that a book and a poem can be considered an entirely human product, is it not so?

In conclusion, let us ask--in view of the entirely real possibility that Kapor and company will have grandchildren--whether they will change their surnames and traces a little later, when they realize how shameful it was to rise in defense of a person who was impudent enough to attempt to besmirch Josip Broz Tito.

BRIEFS

OFFICIAL REPLACED--The [Macedonian] Republican Social Council for Questions of Social Order held a session yesterday to discuss several current problems and the experience from the participation of the Republic in reaching agreements with the socialist republics and autonomous provinces on questions of mutual interest which will be decided upon in the federation. It was stated that agreement among the republics and provinces in the organs of the federation develops with well-known deadlocks and excessive difficulties, which is not just a result of the method of work and the framework of the agreement process, but also of the condition of the economy and the increased difficulties in the overall functioning of the economy and the political system of the country. Taking into consideration that the mandate of the current president, Dr Trajce Grujoski, has expired, the council elected Servet Saliu as the new president with a one-year mandate. JOBS FOR ALBANIAN WOMEN--Tetovo, 26 Nov--A new dispersion section of the Teteks Wool Combine in the village of Pirok was put into operation at a ceremony attended by President of the Executive Council of the Assembly of Macedonia, Blagoj Popov and by political leaders from Tetovo and the Republic, including Azem Zulficari. This is a modern facility with a production shop of 3,600 square meters. Its cost of construction was 140 million dinars and it will employ 150 women per shift. In his statement the director general of the Teteks Wool Combine, Stojan Gorcevski, said that this shop has much greater significance than just a technological production unit. Its opening is helping in the solution of the problem of employment of the female workforce of Albanian nationality, which for historical reasons has been much slower to be included in the universal socioeconomic movement. Vice President of the Executive Council of the Assembly of Macedonia, Hisen Ramadani, particularly dwelled on the question of realizing the rights and equality of peoples and nationalities, stating that on the question of nationalities Yugoslavia represents a truly positive example in the contemporary world and sets an example of a real approach to realization of the rights and equality of peoples and nationalities. CHARTER 77 REPORT ON POLLUTION OF CSSR ENVIRONMENT

Rome LISTY in Czech No 6, Nov 81 pp 34-40

[Text] The Charter 77 spokesmen have received from a circle of signatories a treatise on the state of the environment in our country.

We welcome this contribution because the resolution of the problems submitted and dealt with therein, causes a real or at least generally sensed division of this society into the powerful and the powerless, into authorities and "ordinary people." Our living environment is the concern of all citizens, and if we find a common language in resolving this problem, it will mean a rare opportunity not only for the environment but also for our society in the 1980's.

It is obvious that the outline of the problem as presented is merely fragmentary and considers only certain aspects of a broad, changing, and even today not fully understood range of problems. Given the nature of this matter, it cannot be otherwise; moreover, access to information in this area is difficult or lacking altogether. The treatise, for example, does not deal with the problem of radiation, noise, accumulation of harmful chemicals in food, production and export of wood substances and other raw materials, pollution of subsoil water, local technology for the mining of uranium, effects of urbanization on the land, influences of international political relations, etc. We hope that the treatise will be received by competent authorities, as well as the public, primarily as a stimulus for dealing with these and other aspects, and for putting the outlined problems in the broadest possible perspective, so that we may gradually seek out the causes of the present state of affairs, and adopt concrete remedial measures.

It is clear that environmental problems transcend the framework of professional expertise alone, they are part of one of the basic human rights, namely the right to life, which is also the right of those who come after us. Consequently, responsibility for the environment is an inseparable part of all of us who defend the basic rights and liberties of man. It is obvious from the treatise which follows that without the cooperation of all citizens, these problems cannot be resolved.

The very condition of our environment indicates the need for open discussion, freedom of expression and association for those who want to defend their own interests but also live up to their civic responsibility. Last but not least, it indicates the inevitability of respecting the right of self-determination of nations and their free development.

We consider this report on the environment as a text which we hope will stimulate a great number of citizens and officials to a broader and deeper consideration of the problem, and that it will bring about within them a determination to participate in the elimination of the ominous phenomena which threaten us, as well as future generations.

REPORT ON THE STATE OF OUR ENVIRONMENT

Much has changed in our country in the past 30 years. We are often told in great detail about the positive changes, the richness of our society's achievements and the emergence of new values. The balance sheet presented to the public, however, hardly ever mentions the changes for the worse, the destruction of values or the threat to them. It should be noted that these are not transitory values, but permanent and often irreplaceable losses. Negative changes are seen not only in relations among people, they have also afflicted the relations between man and nature. Our living environment has greatly deteriorated.

The countryside has changed. Where a new settlement emerges, the land can no longer produce. The settlement, however, need not be built on fertile land or, even worse, on the best tillable acres. During the past 7 years, we have lost 10 percent of all fertile agricultural land to all sorts of construction projects. The quality of the land which remains, deteriorates from year to year. Acres smothered by heavy machinery allow neither water nor air to permeate, they contain little humus and an increasing amount of weeds. This portion of natural resources on which our lives depend is in a serious state.

In the span of one generation, the forest has ceased to be a forest in the sense of European tree-growing culture. Except for proliferation of fungi, the harvest of forest fruits is diminishing. It can be said without exaggeration that most of our forests are immediately threatened with terminal decay.

If the numbers of hares and pheasants have dropped many times lately, if we fail to find even a single partridge in the countryside, it is only an ominous indication that the different kinds of plant and animal life are vanishing. Variety in nature is not only a cultural asset but also an important genetic factor which we must not overlook lest we upset the necessary balance in nature.

Never before have we experienced such far-reaching metamorphoses within such a short time. None of the generations which inhabited this land before us, have harmed nature as much as ours. Nature can no longer overcome the abuse of human activity. If we continue in this manner, we will endanger the natural sources of our existence and our territory will become uninhabitable.

There is no doubt that the deterioration of the environment is closely linked with the necessary growth of production. All industrially advanced countries must pay this price of progress (if mere quantitative growth in production can be called social progress). The threat to the environment in the CSSR, however, is specific and in many respects more serious than in a number of other countries. This stems from some of the special features of our economic life.

In comparison with international standards, we are not a big country and square mileage and character do not reflect the volume and especially the kind of our economic operations. There is an overabundance of heavy industry, while the quality of environmental protection against noxious manifestations and their consequences is low. Our industrial operations require large amounts of energy, primarily for transportation (to a lesser extent for extraction) of all raw materials, secondly, for their processing which is highly energy-consuming and, lastly, for transport again of heavy products, often too costly in terms of labor.

All these operations produce waste matter which harms, or destroys outright, our living environment. In comparison with the volume of waste matter and harmful byproducts, we must realize that our country is too small to afford such behavior for too long. We occupy first place in the world in the per capita production of ash debris. We pollute the waters as if we had 4 million more inhabitants, and filter it in a manner which reflects 4 million less. In comparison with advanced European states, our environmental protection is less effective, both in the quality of technological means used to improve the existing situation and in the damage to society by industrial and other enterprises which pollute the environment, and against which we apply insufficient protective measures.

Over the years, not enough attention has been devoted to the protection of the environment, which remained of secondary interest even at the recent CPCZ congress. In the discussion contribution of the prime minister of the CSR, the following was stated: "We also do not forget that without clean air, clean rivers and an abundance of forests, our concern for the living standard would completely lose its meaning." Is it true that we do not forget?

The Air We Breathe

Our atmosphere is polluted with harmful substances, in small concentrations in some places, beyond the permissible limits in others. Even in places to which we travel in search of "fresh air," we can measure considerable amounts of pollution.

For along with the air, we inhale oxides of phosphorus, carbon, and nitrogen, halogens, phenols, nitrates, hydrogen sulphide and emissions from gasoline and fuel oil, as well as a whole range of toxic substances which the present development of the human organism did not take into account.

Entire regions are polluted through the constant presence of harmful emissions: the Low and High Krusne Mountains from the Karlsbad area to Decin, the atmosphere of Central Bohemia is deteriorating rapidly, as is the Melnik area, also affected are the Pardubice area and Northern Moravia. Automobile-exhaust pollution has been added to industrial emissions. The atmosphere in Prague and Bratislava is as bad as that of the highly polluted areas of Most and Chomutov. Certain Prague districts even have a higher concentration of sulphur dioxide than the North Bohemian region (see VECERNI PRAHA of 9 February 1981). Gas emissions are joined by solid particles. The fall of ash in the CSSR has an annual average of 280 kilograms per inhabitant (we are at the head of the world chart), in certain sections of Bratislava this reaches as much as 1,000 tons per square kilometer annually. About 4 million inhabitants, i.e., 26 percent of the population, live in highly polluted areas which are harmful to health.

The main source of pollution is the burning of fossil fuels. In Europe as a whole, we annually pollute the atmosphere with 25 million tons of sulphur, and our share considerably exceeds the average corresponding to our size and number of inhabitants. Our fuels and energy consumption is based predominantly on the use of lower quality fuels, especially brown coal and lignite. Such fuels have a low heating capacity and produce large quantities of waste, especially sulphur and ash. These conditions will not improve, on the contrary, the sulphur content in coal increases constantly and, with the dropping of heating capacity, it is necessary to burn increasingly more coal. In addition to electric plants and production enterprises, such coal is used in 70 percent of households.

Tall chimneys reaching up to several hundred meters do not provide a solution and represent merely a form of abili. They help improve the situation in the immediate vicinity of the pollutant, while scattering harmful substances across a larger area. The industrial regions and neighboring states trade their emissions in this manner.

The polluted atmosphere has lately become an enormous burden on the national economy as well. Among other things, it raises the acidity of soil, disrupts building operations, and causes rapid deterioration in metal construction. Nevertheless, the greatest harm done by pollution is to living organisms. Even leaving aside the effect on human beings (we are as yet far from understanding all the long-term consequences of emissions), the state of our forests is disturbing enough even today.

In some ways, forest growth is subjected to double the amounts of pollution which inevitably lead to extinction. Other forest areas which vegetate under seemingly tolerable concentration of pollution do not die off immediately, but are seriously weakened. They thus become susceptible to assault by living organisms and weather conditions which a healthy forest would be able to cope with. With the exception of Sumava [Bohemian Forest] where this metamorphosis is as yet little noticeable, all forests in the Bohemian border regions have been severely damaged. Some are beyond salvage, such as the Krusne, Luzicke and Jizerske mountains, and the western part of the Giant Mountains. A situation threatening annihilation, however, may soon be reached in the forest growth in the Beskydy, Jeseniky, and Orlicke mountains, and other inland forests. The effect of emissions and weakening of coniferous trees, is already noticeable.

Our forests represent a national treasure which we inherited from our forefathers and which we should safeguard for future generations (a tree grows for 100 years), not only as recreational areas and ornaments of unparallelled beauty on our land, but they are also an irreplaceable factor in water economy, in protection of soil, living things, and in the formation of the atmosphere. Even if for no other reason than to save the forests, all efforts must be focused on the improvement of air quality.

The Water We Drink

A similarly disturbing phenomenon is water pollution. In the near future, we will have to transport clean water over long distances and purchase it in containers, as we do milk and other beverages.

It is quite natural that all substances dispersed in the air will, sooner or later, end up in water. On top of this, there are pollutants which reach water without the intermediary of the atmosphere, simply by being placed there.

Our potable water contains a number of elements which reach it predominantly in the form of waste. On the other hand, this type of water lacks certain minute natural elements essential for the development of organisms. Two factors share in approximately equal parts in water pollution. The first pollutes it along the entire length of streams and in the whole process of water circulation. This is the way water is reached by chemical matter used in agriculture, especially nitrates. Together with rainwater, the soil of underground fertilizer waters is permeated with other matter distributed in the fields, and industrial emissions falling over our entire territory. These constantly growing impurities are joined each year by hundreds of so-called accidents which strike at both surface and underground waters. The most serious of these is crude-oil spillage which is caused by a wide variety of technological shortcomings (the last serious crude-oil accident was the leak in the pipeline near Havlickuv Brod. It is regrettable that the public was not--as in similar cases--informed of the causes and the magnitude of the calamity).

This type of pollution factor is largely general and anonymous. The second factor, just as devastating to water quality, almost always has an exact address and the measure of responsibility is clear. On hundreds of sites, waste is knowingly released into streams. We are referring to that portion of urban and industrial waste which industry is unable to process. Most organic pollution comes from the sewer system, and from the food, chemical and textile industries, as well as paper mills. Even though the rest of the industrial sector has a lower share in this type of pollution, it often involves exceptionally noxious substances.

The bulk of this so-called waste water can, before releasing it into the streams, be cleaned and adapted to acceptable and, in hygienic terms, permissible levels.

For as long as 22 years, our laws have demanded filtering but, unfortunately, these laws also permit the government to authorize exceptions. At the present time, more and more exceptions are being granted, and those in the know have no doubt that when the Czech and Slovak governments deal with this problem the next time, they will have no choice but to extend most of these exceptional permits.

Every year, plans for the construction of filtering stations are lowered in the central organs, and even the approved remainder is usually not implemented in practical terms. With the current rate, it seems that we will not be able to build the needed installations in less than 50 years (the rate of construction of new filtering stations in 1976-80 was indeed lower than in 1961-65) and since the sources of pollution will in the near future multiply rather than decrease, the quality of air and water will in the coming years continue to deteriorate.

The air in the countryside is still somewhat clearer than in the industrial concentrations, but the same cannot be said of the water. Frequently, water in the country is polluted with nitrates to such an extent that it can be considered a liquid suitable for use as fertilizer. Sometimes it is so bad that it cannot even be used for irrigation. City water usually contains less nitrate but more of the other toxic substances, including dozens of virus types capable of infecting hundreds of thousands of people every year.

Threatened Land, Threatened Man

Polluted air and water have a negative effect on people's health. We must also bear in mind that by no means all aftereffects manifest themselves today, and that therefore we do not even know them all. The deterioration of the environment came about too suddenly and the metamorphoses found us unprepared. The human organism did not have time to develop protective mechanisms, assuming that such exist.

For the time being, it is possible to live with polluted air and polluted water. The question is how well and for how long. The chief hygienist of the CSR announced officially that a concentration of 660 units of sulphur dioxide is the upper limit tolerable by man without damage to his health. But according to regional measurements in 1979, such concentration in the city of Chomutov reaches 860 units of SO_2. In the vicinity and in the direction of the mountains it rises to as much as 1,300 units, 1,000 in Jirkov, 880 in Klasterec nad Ohri, and 1,200 in Vejprty. Similar conditions exist in many localities of the Most, Teplice, and Usti areas, but also in the vicinity of Karlsbad and Cheb.

Children growing up in areas in which there is increased burning of energy coal, have as much as one-fifth higher count in red blood corpuscles. This is the way our organism reacts to sulphur dioxide in the atmosphere to restore oxygen sufficiency. It is an emergency measure. Each such change deprives the organism of energy which then manifests itself in different ways. Lack of reserves used up in the defense against a polluted environment becomes noticeable especially in time of sickness. In polluted industrial areas, among which we can in full measure include, for example, the industrial districts of Prague, there may not actually be more cases of upper respiratory tract inflammations, but in those which occur, the complications are usually more serious. In heavily polluted areas, cases of leukemia in children are more common and the knitting of children's bones occurs a year later than is normal.

All this damage at an early age carries over into adulthood. Water containing nitrates fed to infants creates conditions for heart disease after the age of 30. If it is replaced by mineral water, there may be damage to the kidneys which are then still in the formative stage. Thus, the only way to ensure healthy development is to use clean water.

The average life expectancy in highly polluted areas is already 3 years less than elsewhere. Only the future will show how coming generations which have lived with pollution since birth will react, and ewhat aspects of their own physical damage they will pass on to their children at conception. Economic losses caused by deterioration of the environment are of such magnitude that often they are likened to the total cost of our entire retirement benefits system. Even more significant, however, are the losses which cannot be translated into figures and which represent a great worsening of the quality of life.

Secrecy Delays Needed Changes

The deteriorating environment is talked about in our country with an officially weighed measure of criticism. Some data appear from time to time in publications with limited circulation and intended for a small circle of specialists, other data, such as, for instance, on the harmful effects of pollution on health, are considered secret. We believe that this factual concealment of the truth is dangerous. Efforts to create the impression that the deterioration of the environment, while an unpleasant problem, is one of a secondary nature which is in the process of being resolved today and will remain manageable in the future, are obviously prompted by fear of panic. But, in fact, if there is panic, it will be the consequence of ill-conceived long-term concealment of an alarming reality. If the authorities admitted, for example, what the inhabitants of Chomutov are exposed to every day, the number of people moving out of the area would promptly increase. Many citizens would consider their and their children's health more important than higher wages. This would cause economic complications, there might arise questions of who is responsible and above all, doubts whether the economic development of past years had been planned and conceived intelligently, or whether in its consequences it was bound to bring about negative changes in our living environment.

For example, extraction and burning of brown coal is planned to increase in the coming decade, while coal extracted in the future will contain 7-10 percent sulphur, so that the sulphur content in the atmosphere will increase by half again. Moreover, this coal will be mined at enormous expense.

More towns and industrial complexes which will have to be relocated, will be sacrificed to surface mines several dozen meters deep, while no one has a realistic idea whether there is any chance of restoring the land destroyed in the process. If we continue in this manner, the quality of water will also get worse every year because pollution sources still grow faster than measures against them. Even today, the amount of nitrates in water is alarming, while intensification of agricultural production is merely in its initial stages. The effects of pollution are often noticeable only some time after the entry of the harmful substances into the soil; consequently, we cannot tell if the amount of nitrates in water corresponds to the current quantities of chemicals used in agriculture. One thing is certain, namely, with the current thinking in agriculture and its corresponding practices which have the sole purpose of a constant quantitative rise in production, water and air will later be in even worse condition than today.

Main Pollution Sources and the Road to Improvement

We believe that in order to achieve a meaningful turn in this problem, we must focus on the principal sources of pollution, even though we must not overlook the others. The main source of atmospheric pollution is the type of noxious emissions produced by burning brown coal and most emissions from thermal electric plants. Thus far, we have not resorted to technology which would isolate the sulphur and prevent it from entering the atmosphere. Unless we do this on a large scale, there is no choice but to reduce, rather than increase, the use of brown coal. This need not cause our energy inventory to decrease, provided we overcome prevailing views that to each additional requirement in production we must react by further increasing it. The capacity of 100 (or 1,000, or 5,000) megawatts of electric energy anticipated for the necessary increment in our energy inventory, can be resolved in one of two ways; either by new capital investment construction which is the currently preferred method, or by decreasing current consumption by the same amount. There is no doubt that the second alternative is equally effective, less costly and more desirable with respect to the environment. While we have a state program of rationalization in energy consumption, it is inadequate and not properly adhered to. This is not because we have reached the limit of our capabilities, but rather because we have insufficiently applied factors which would inevitably lead to savings in this field. International comparison clearly shows that in energy consumption per production unit, we are far behind developed states. About 30 percent can be saved if we apply already known technological methods. Instead of progressive investment in energy savings which would benefit the environment, we keep investing in increasing extraction of brown coal and in additional electric plants which harm the environment. Most of our electricity--about three-fourths--is used up by large and medium consumers. Yet, production enterprises are still not sufficiently motivated to deal with the problem of savings seriously. The catch is that in terms of budget considerations, they do not feel pressed into this, since the cost is anticipated in the production plans. Also, they have learned to live with limited availability of energy, which is easier and less demanding than engaging in the complicated process of introducing new, more economical technology. The lack of concern in many enterprises about the need for energy conservation is primarily the result of economic calculations under the given indicators. The management knows that the superior organs which request a product, will in the end agree to allocate sufficient energy resources. And even in the worst situation, there is always the reserve of free resources, for example, Saturdays. The struggle for energy is waged in negotiations with distribution plants and higher organs, rather than with technological components.

For the most part, the enterprises are not even equipped for energy conservation. While other developed industrial countries established the position of specialist in energy conservation years ago, our enterprise workers in energy often lack even rudimentary technical knowledge. Even if they do have such qualifications, they cannot or are not permitted to put it to practical use. They are not expected to be experts on energy conservation, rather their basic task is to ensure sufficient amounts of energy, and their performance is rated accordingly. For this purpose, there are no supraenterprise branch and state organs which would effectively deal with the problem and provide practical assistance to the enterprises in the handling of it. It is not surprising that under these circumstances, there remain many unexploited opportunities for energy conservation and that the main developmental trend is focused on finding new energy sources.

While insufficiently informed citizens get a taste of the deteriorating environment, they are ignorant of its true state and its relationships. Consequently, they consider calls for energy conservation (primarily in the production process where it would be more effective) just another type of moralizing official exhortation toward economizing generally, and they react accordingly. Until such time as the need to improve the critically threatened environment becomes the subject of a broadly-based, open discussion, and until energy conservation is understood as a task transcending all other political and economic imperatives as a goal directed at the protection of health and salvage of the land, we cannot expect a turn in energy consumption toward real rationalization.

It is difficult to take seriously the words of our national economic officials on the need for energy conservation when we find that in a district capital it is impossible to find even simple insulation materials for windows and doors. It is well known that in our country, perhaps more than anywhere else in Central Europe, we are guilty of an enormous waste in energy. In a society whose environment is so overburdened with burning coal, we would expect more concern for improvement by the state. We believe it is not asking too much to require responsible institutions to check the heating systems in buildings (where most losses occur) as is customary in other countries, and advise the manager or owner how to effectively prevent waste, how to use supplementary energy sources and how to economize in this area. Again, the catch is that by far most citizens living in housing settlements have no immediate material incentive to conserve heating and hot water. Energy experts have found, for example, that the system of measuring heating and hot-water consumption in individual households leads to substantial savings (30 percent immediately). Unfortunately, we do not have the means for the introduction of heating and hot-water meters. Automatic regulation in thermal plants is indeed economical, however, there is a lack of necessary equipment (small and medium thermal plants in cities do not even have ash separators). There is a shortage of thermostats of sufficient variety and at acceptable prices. Most electrical appliances for home use are wasteful in energy, and more rational models are still too expensive. We are falling behind the global trend of energy conservation, without even considering effective new technological advances. A more thoughtful policy of energy conservation and consumption, overall state support and, where needed, subsidization at the expense of coal mining and thermal plants, can contribute to a halt in environmental deterioration. In order for things to start improving, it will be necessary to gradually eliminate all industrial emissions and, above all, to restructure the whole system of energy production and consumption.

Certain International Relationships

Even if we do not increase the amount of noxious substances in the burning of coal, we still cannot be sure that the harmful content of our atmosphere will not grow. Pollution sources in the GDR contribute to half of the overall pollution in Northern Bohemia. Pollution originating from sources in the Polish People's Republic [PLR] add significantly to atmospheric deterioration in the areas of the Jizerske and Luzicke mountains. Our own efforts to halt emissions would produce only limited results, if the planned growth of brown coal electric plants in the GDR and PLR is implemented in areas from whence we are afflicted today.

Whereas up to now the reaction to mutual pollution was that there is no sense in blaming one another, effective measures adopted by one side must establish an entirely new relationship, i.e., emphatic defense of national interests and international resolution of a critical situation.

Is Nuclear Energy the Answer?

In Europe and other parts of the world there has for years existed an activist movement of opponents of nuclear power plants. We understand its motivation and carefully monitor its argumentation. For us, Czechoslovak citizens, however, the immediate threat comes from the existing traditional sources of electricity. We are overwhelmed with gas and solid emissions to an extent which imperils life itself. Unless we want to give up the bulk of electric power and sink to a lower level of technology and civilization, we must turn to other, unconventional energy sources. The best answer, of course, would be in the new "clean sources," i.e., direct conversion of solar energy, geothermal, and hydraulic energy, etc. It is doubtful though that practical application of these sources will materialize before the year 2000. Naturally, we should even now exploit all technologically viable opportunities of solar collectors, thermal pumps for heating water, etc. Special attention should be given to the construction of hydroelectric plants, especially on smaller streams where some small plants had shortsightedly been liquidated. Recently, nuclear power plants have been coming to the fore.

Research conducted around the world, indicates that nuclear energy is many times safer (British findings claim 140 times) than thermal energy plants. Under Czechoslovak conditions, this sounds promising. Nevertheless, we should consider the undisputable, as well as anticipated, risks. If, however, we still favor nuclear power due to its being "clean," we must, of course, insist that all measures to protect human health and the environment, be consistently respected. The Czechoslovak nuclear program is based on the VVER electric power plants. These installations in Jaslovske Bohunice and Dukovany, however, do not have the active zone protected by a double layer as is customary today in nuclear plant construction in the West, and even in Finland, which has already installed this type of protection. This is a matter of mandatory caution in the interest of the population in countries where a nuclear plant cannot be built in the wilderness, but sometimes as close as 20 kilometers from the nearest settlement. In Western European countries, the protective coating is planned and tested against external shock equivalent of an airplane crash. The likelihood that a nuclear power plant would ever become the site of an airplane disaster is remote, but the consequences of such an improbable accident in a densely populated country would be so catastrophic that it is not hard to understand such caution, and demand it here, too.

Equally stringent measures must be enforced in the storage of radioactive waste (fully leakproof for 600 years), in the disposal of water containing tritium, and finally in special training and restrictions on work schedules of nuclear plant personnel. If these technicians work perhaps only 12 hours a week with ample opportunity for maximum concentration, it is more important to society than the so-called productive utilization of labor with the attendant risk of human error. In other words, in the construction and operation of nuclear plants, the criteria for economizing cannot be applied in the same manner as in other types of endeavor.

Automobile Traffic

Inhabitants of urban centers residing near communciations arteries with heavy motor car traffic, suffer not only from industrial emissions but are, in addition, afflicted with the effects of toxic exhaust fumes of gasoline and engine oil. Their health is thus doubly jeopardized. Our motor construction, chemical composition, and even maintenance practices are not up to world standards and requirements for environmental protection. Even though atmospheric pollution by exhaust fumes from the internal combustion engine still remains a global problem in certain formerly critically polluted areas, thanks to effective technological and organizational measures, the situation is beginning to improve, as for instance, in Japan. Pollution in our big cities, especially Prague and Bratislava, however, is not likely to recede in the foreseeable future. Radical curtailment of traffic and exclusion of transit roads from the inner city, are not yet on the horizon, on the contrary, Prague inherited a new source of pollution (the long-distance expressway runs through the city). Introduction of trolley buses for urban mass transit is not being considered, neither are electric-powered vehicles. Yet, the constantly diminishing green areas in cities, can no longer fulfill their role of filters. The desirable size of plant life area per inhabitant is 20-25 square meters, but in Bratislava this comes to only 4 square meters. According to the VECERNI PRAHA of 9 April 1981, in the Nove Mesto district of Prague, there is only 1.2 square meters of green area per person, and in the Smichov district 0.89 square meters.

What Can Be Done to Purify Water

Directives have been issued demanding adherence to certain rules in the vicinity of local water works, in the so-called protective zones. We must welcome this effort and support it in every possible way. Control of pollution sources emanating from agriculture does not need capital investment and costly measures nearly as much as it needs thoughtful and intelligent action. Often we find cases where a whole variety of chemical substances is placed in the soil, not because the crop absolutely needs them or because it was impossible to achieve the same effect by other, cleaner methods, but rather because the distribution of chemicals is planned in a stereotyped manner and had been earlier agreed on in contracts. We must create conditions in which we have a much better overview of the situation in order to reduce pollution caused by releasing noxious substances from sewers and industrial waste into our streams. It has already been mentioned that construction of filtering stations is being postponed and runs behind planned requirements, as well as in keeping up with growing pollution. In the next 20 years, the amount of organic pollutants is expected to rise by a full one-third of the present amount. Central organs still do not consider the need of the population for clean water of primary importance. This is demonstrated by the fact that less than .5 percent of all planned capital investment is allocated for waste-filtering stations. We are aware that there are many diverse needs and special interests which have to be considered in the allocation of public funds, but the purity of water, a crucial element of life which we use every day and on which depends the present and future well-being of the nation, should certainly be considered more valuable than the equivalent of one two-hundredth of all anticipated other interests.

Our Tasks

We maintain that the state of the living environment in the CSSR is very serious, certainly more serious than is officially admitted. If responsible citizens during the next few years succeed in halting the deterioration of the environment, it will be an important milestone for society. Eventually, actual improvement of the quality of air, water and the overall condition of nature is imperative for the future of our two nations. It will require more modern technological approaches, newly-conceived, less wasteful energy consumption and the ability to process that which today we consider waste. Making our environment healthier will not be possible without basic reconstruction of the industrial branches which henceforth must give nature a chance to adapt itself to the disruptive effects of progress.

Last but not least, we must gradually recapture again that long-lost, as well as newly-perceived, wisdom which is able to distinguish what in the life of man is really important. The finite character of life's necessities must lead us not only to the art of deliberate economic management, but also to the willingness to give up certain claims to an even more leisurely and, through technology, more guaranteed way of life oriented only toward the consumption of material assets. We will be confronted with a new way of thinking, a new assessment of values and an awakening to new responsibilities. The very condition of our living environment summons us to this task.

We Propose:

--Open a public discussion on the state and outlook of our environment, and make it possible for the public to effectively participate in the recovery of our natural resources through spontaneous associations and initiatives; only through cooperation between the authorities and informed citizens can we hope to achieve beneficial changes. This effort will make use of already existing concepts which are oriented, more or less, in the right direction. We should enhance the authority of the existing Union for the Protection of Nature, and authorize the establishment and activity of similar associations and committees at all levels.

--Organize freely-elected committees for the protection of the environment and healthy working conditions in plants whose production most negatively affects the environment (chemical, lime and cement works, large electric plants, metallurgical works and mines). In cases where, as a result of production, the environment continues to deteriorate further and remedial action fails to bring about the desired results, these committees will have the right to propose a halt in operations and in capital investment construction.

--National committees of all levels will inform the public of environmental damage caused by industrial or agricultural operations which, by their importance, transcend the jurisdiction of a given national committee.

--Organize a committee for the protection of the environment which, as an independent citizens' initiative--and separate from official organs or already existing associations--would study the problem and propose appropriate action.

--In design and operations of nuclear power plants, all safety measures customary in European countries with dense populations, must be applied.

--Motivate trade union plant committees and higher union organs to insist, in line with their mission, on the observance of laws and standards which apply to this area and, if needed, propose supplements and amendments. If appropriate, the union organs should revise their collective contracts and add clauses dealing with environmental protection at the enterprise and broader level.

--We call on economists and economic managers to assess without bias the impact of contemporary national economic concepts of our state on the environment and present their conclusions to the public for evaluation.

--Ensure deserved publicity for economic problems, publish in sufficiently large editions the works of Czechoslovak specialists, as well as translations of foreign authors. Prepare regular, comprehensive reports on the state of the environment and its prospects to be published in easily accessible periodicals on the national and regional levels; publish an ecological atlas of the CSSR containing information on the principal sources of air and water pollution, on the state of our fauna and flora, etc. In highly threatened areas, also inform the public by means of the mass information media on the degree of noxious concentrations, dangerous drinking water, etc.

--Initiate tripartite negotiations of the CSSR, GDR and the PLR, where measures against further deterioration of the environment in the border regions would be coordinated. Adopt the principle that measures by one of these countries must not be frustrated through higher noxious emissions on the territory of the other two. Publicize the course and results of such negotiations. We propose that CSSR state representatives take the initiative toward the formation of a permanent European council for the environment, based on principles of cooperation among participants of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. Following a preliminary exchange of views and programs, strive in the first phase for effective cooperation with all neighboring countries; in the second, enter negotiations proper on the all-European level.

--Make arrangements for existing organs and, in the future, for new organizations, associations and individuals who are interested in environmental problems, to allow them free communication and exchange of information with similar organizations, associations and individuals abroad.

--We propose that the Directives for National Economic Development for 1981-85 include proposed solutions for the negative effects of the existing orientation of production, extraction of raw materials, and related transport operations, on the living environment. The directives should set aside a portion of capital investment for the installation or modernization of ash separators, equipment in electric and thermal plants for the removal of sulphur, construction of filtering stations, etc. Make it quite clear to enterprises and national committees that, in accordance with appropriate new legislation, the Czech and Slovak governments will after 1985 no longer grant exceptions for the filtering of water waste. Include in the cited directives measures which would lead to a significant improvement of the environment by the end of this decade at the latest.

STUDENT QUESTIONS ON MILITARY ACADEMIES ANSWERED

Bratislava SMENA in Slovak 14 Nov 81 p 3

[Answers to student questions by Lt Col Stefan Durkovic: "Military Schools"]

[Text] In these days, students at basic and high schools are making the final decision on what field of study they will major in at high school or college. Many of them are interested in study at military schools. This is borne out by the questions which they sent to our editor. In our supplement FREKVENCIA CSO 77 MILITARY SCHOOLS, these questions are answered by CSLA [Czechoslovak People's Army] member Lt Col Stefan Durkovic.

High Schools

[Question by Milan Pacovsky, Cadca] What are the conditions that an applicant for study at the military school must meet?

[Answer] He must be interested and possess prerequisites indispensable for performance of service as a professional soldier as well as political and moral qualities and good health. CSSR citizenship also is required. Naturally, he must successfully complete ZDS [9-year basic school] and, if an applicant for study at college, he must also pass maturita [secondary school graduation examination]. There is emphasis on the age limit but we shall deal with that in connection with another question.

[Question by Viera Patakyova, Nove Zamky] My son is interested in study at a military school. Whom should he ask for assistance: the school or military administration?

[Answer] Requests and applications for all types of military schools are accepted and discussed by the appropriate--okres or district--military administration. The applicant for study at a high school will call on the military administration according to the place of his residence. The applicants for study at a college, 2-year officer school, 1-year maturita course and female applicants for a course for women will get in touch with the military administration in the territory where they attended the high school.

[Question by Peter Sykora, Krupina] I have heard that there is an age limit for study at military schools.

[Answer] Boys who apply for study at high schools, those who have finished the eighth or ninth grade of ZDS by 15 July of the year in which they send the application must be 14 years old and must not be older than 16 years when they start the study. Applicants for study at military colleges must not be older than 24 years in the year in which they start studying, but a 21-year limit applies to students at the Military College for Pilots in Kosice.

[Question by Michal Sedlak, Puchov] Do students at military schools have vacations or only furloughs?

[Answer] Since the military schools are part of the Czechoslovak educational system, similar regulations apply to the duration of studies and vacations. Students at military high schools have vacations at the same time and of the same length as corresponding civilian schools, that is, 10 days during Christmas and New Year holidays and 7 days of vacation in spring. Summer vacations last 6 weeks. During vacation, high school students can wear civilian clothes. College students have a vacation of 7-10 days during the Christmas and New Year holidays, 7 days after the end of the winter semester and 30 days of summer vacation.

[Question by Ernest Stric, Kezmarok] Some people say that the maturita certificate or engineer's diploma issued by a military school is not valid upon return to civilian life.

[Answer] This is not true. Our army is naturally interested in continued service of graduates from military schools. However, if an individual for reasons of health or other reasons returns to civilian life, his education acquired in the army fully applies to his civilian status and employment. This is clearly formulated in the laws and decrees applicable to high schools, in the law on colleges, Labor Code and other regulations.

[Question by Maria Ferencova, Michalovce, and Maria B, Dubnica nad Vahom] What possibility of studying at military schools exists for girls?

[Answer] At the present time, the CSLA does not accept girls for any type of military schools. This does not mean, however, that you cannot become a CSLA member. After completing high school study ending with the maturita, you can register for study in a 1-year technical course. The upper age limit for the female applicant is 21 years. You can enroll in the course at Kosice: for ground specialists of air force at Nove Mesto nad Vahom, signal file service and in Prague, operator of radio-technical troops, signal specialist (spojovaci specialista) of state air defense. After the completion of the course, you will become a member of the staff sergeant corps. The okres or district military administration will supply you with information on start of these courses.

[Question by Rudolf Bockal, Humenne] In which town are the military gymnasiums located?

[Answer] There are four military gymnasiums in our entire country: at Banska Bystrica, Moravska Trebova, Opava and Prague-Ruzyn. These are selective boarding schools, basic subjects are determined by the curricula of civilian gymnasiums--Czech or Slovak language, Russian language, mathematics, physics, geography, history, chemistry, descriptive geometry, biology and geology, creative arts or music and military preparation. In addition to Russian, students learn another foreign language. The 4-year course at the military gymnasiums ends with the maturita examination.

[Question by Stefan Lambert, Komarno] What subjects are part of entrance examinations for military technical high schools?

[Answer] In the mother tongue--Slovak or Czech--mathematics and physical fitness. Part of the entrance proceedings is also an interview with the applicant. Study at military secondary technical schools lasts 4 years and ends with the maturita examination. Military high schools are in the following cities: Martin--the graduates can perform commander and technical functions in the artillery units, army engineer corps and armament service; Nove Mesto nad Vahom--communication electric engineering (oznamovacia elektrotechnika); Zilina--training of experts for food supply, armament and health service as well as service for motor fuels and lubricants; Valasske Mezirici--command and technical functions for chemical, railroad and highway troops; Nitra--graduates perform technical functions in tank and automobile units; Presov--training of staff sergeants for the function of technicians in engineering-aviation service, radio operators for air force and technicians for weather service for air force; Liptovsky Mikulas--electrical equipment for air defense troops; and Roudnice nad Labem--graduates become members of military orchestras.

[Question by Vladimir Hubka, Bratislava] If I were to start studying at a military technical high school, when would I be called to basic military service?

[Answer] Students at military technical high schools do 5-month substitute military service instead of basic military service. According to the military law, they do substitute military service from 15 February to 15 July in the fourth year of their studies. When the student starts substitute military service, his parents cease to be entitled to family allowance.

[Question by Peter Dzurik, Liptovsky Mikulas] If I am not accepted by the military high schools, can I file an appeal against the decision and to whom should this appeal be addressed?

[Answer] Upon the conclusion of entrance proceedings, the parents are notified of the result. The notification is simultaneously sent to the appropriate military administration and principal of the school in which the applicant finishes his obligatory school attendance. The appeal can be filed by the parents within 15 days of the notification. The appeal is sent to the CSSR Ministry of National Defense through the mediation of the military school which conducted the entrance proceedings. The applicant will be notified in writing of the final decision.

[Question by Jan Jurek, Banska Bystrica] I have heard that 2-year schools for officers [DDS] were abolished in our army. Is this true?

[Answer] You have incorrect information. The DDS are at Presov, Martin, Liptovsky Mikulas, Nitra, Nove Mesto nad Vahom and Valasske Mezirici. The boys trained in blue-collar and agricultural jobs are offered complete high school education with the maturita examination and military technical training qualifying them for performance of basic commander and officer's technical functions. These are boarding schools. The DDS students do substitute military service during the first 5 months of their studies whereupon they are accepted as professional soldiers in the rank of sergeant first class. The monthly income of the DDS student is Kcs 850 in the first year and Kcs 950 in the second year. Following practical service in the units, they continue their studies at the military college.

[Question by Juraj Novotny, Poprad] What is the purpose of 1-year maturita courses and what are the work possibilities upon their completion?

[Answer] One-year maturita courses take place in selective boarding schools. The students acquire complete general high school education with the maturita examination and are prepared for study at military colleges. Registration is open to CSSR citizens from the ranks of blue-collar and agricultural apprentices properly trained up to 20 years of age who meet the political, moral and health requirements and have the required grades. The 1-year maturita courses are organized at the military educational center of the First Czechoslovak Army Corps in Martin and military education center in Liptovsky Mikulas. After completing the course, the students enroll in military college from which they graduate with the rank of lieutenant with an engineer's diploma. For the 1982/1983 school year for graduates with a matura, CSLA will also reopen 1-year schools for officers in the following cities: Hranice in Moravia--motorized rifle shooting (motostrelecky smer); Opava--construction and housing; Liptovsky Mikulas--air defense; Presov--air force commanders. The students will graduate with the rank of second lieutenant with the prospect of continuing their study, after practical service in the unit, at military college.

Schools of Higher Learning

[Question by Ivan Gasparik, Senica] I will submit to the matura examination at the end of this school year. For which military schools of higher learning can I apply?

[Answer] It is a pity that you do not indicate the type of school which you attend and in which field of study you are interested. As a result, I can give you general information only. There is a military college for ground troops at Vyskov in Moravia for study in the following fields: motorized rifle-shooting troops and reconnaissance; tanks; artillery; army engineer and chemical disciplines. At the A. Zapotocky Military Academy in Brno the following fields can be studied: tanks and automobiles; army engineer troops and engineering; armament--technical; armament--electrical engineering; military communication equipment; military computers; geodesy, cartography and weather service. In Bohemia, it is possible to study at the J. E. Purkyne Military Institute for Medical Research and Advanced Training in Hradec Kralove: general medicine, stomatology and general pharmacy, and in the military department of the Charles University Faculty of Physical Education and Sports. There are five military colleges in Slovakia: Military Technical College at Liptovsky Mikulas with emphasis on air defense, radar and signal troops; Military College of Aviation in Kosice for pilots' training and engineering air service; at Zilina there are two schools: Military College for Securing Rear and Equipment--economics of the army--food, armament, motor fuel supply and financing, and Military Faculty of the Transportation and Communications College--construction and restoration of railroad tracks, military transportation. Bratislava offers the possibility of studying military policy at the Military Political Academy.

General Information

[Question by Pavol K., Dolny Kubin] If I register for study at a military college, will I have to do the basic military service?

[Answer] According to the defense law every CSSR citizen, mentally and physically able, must do service in the state armed forces. Nobody can be excused from this basic service, one of the most honorable duties of the citizen. As a student at a military college, you will do substitute military service during the first 5 months of your studies. Then you will become a professional soldier with all rights and requisites. As is the case at a military high school, room and board and outfit are paid for by the military administration.

[Question by Mikulas Jankovic, Filakovo] What scholarship does the military college student receive?

[Answer] After enrolling at a military college, the student does substitute military service during the first 5 months. Upon the completion of substitute military service, he becomes a professional soldier in the rank of sergeant first class. His monthly income usually is Kcs 900 during the first year of studies, Kcs 1,000 during the second year, Kcs 1,200 during the third year, Kcs 1,300 during the fourth year and Kcs 1,500 during the fifth and following years. Married students receive a special monthly allowance of Kcs 300 for their dependent spouse and Kcs 200 for each of their dependent children. Students graduate from the college with an engineering degree and rank of lieutenant.

[Question by Julius Bakos, Brezno] I have decided to study at the SNP [Slovak National Uprising] Military Aviation College in Kosice, pilot branch. My friends, however, tell me that pilot training in the Zvazarm aeroclub is a precondition for enrollment. Otherwise allegedly I will not be accepted...

[Answer] Although completion of training in airplanes or gliders of the Zvazarm aeroclub is not a condition, applicants who have completed this training are selected on a priority basis. In addition to the basic conditions of enrollment at any military college, the applicant for pilot training must not be older than 21 years, must have complete secondary education, including the maturita examination, and must meet a particularly strict criterion in regard to health. Prior to the entrance examinations, the applicant is invited to the Institute for Aviation Medicine in Prague where, following scrupulous examination, the decision is made whether he is physically fit.

[Question by Jozef Miklosovic, Lucenec] A friend who is studying at a military college praised the material facilities at his school so highly that I suspected him of exaggeration. Are the technical facilities at military schools really so excellent?

[Answer] You have not said what your friend specifically talked about. The fact is that military colleges are located in recently built comprehensive compounds. Their classrooms, laboratories, special equipment rooms and special classrooms are furnished with the most modern aids and equipment. In addition to the educational section, the compound usually contains dormitories and space for cultural activities and sports. The teaching staff has the best specialists of the army in its ranks. All teaching aids, extensive libraries, facilities for various hobby clubs are available to students. It is possible to say that military schools have created all conditions and prerequisites for a harmonious development of student personality.

[Question by Jan Vretenar, Opava] I want to study at the CSSP [Czechoslovak-Soviet Friendship] military technological college at Liptovsky Mikulas. At the present time, however, I am doing basic military service. Do I have the right to take time off for entrance examinations?

[Answer] A soldier doing basic military service has the right to apply for study at military school. If you need time off for entrance examinations, you can be granted an extraordinary furlough. This is a specific case in which the commander of the unit will decide whether your personal absence will not be detriment to combat efficiency and combat readiness of your unit.

[Question by Bozena Karabova, Bratislava] My son will finish military gymnasium by the end of this school year. Does he have a chance to study at the military college of physical education in Prague?

[Answer] The correct name of the school is: the Military Department of the Charles University Faculty of Physical Education and Sports (VO FTVS UK) in Prague. I want to emphasize, however, that the purpose of study at a gymnasium is to prepare students primarily for study at the Military College for Ground Troops at Vyskov in Moravia and Military Technical College at Liptovsky Mikulas. If your son decides in favor of another school, his application will be ruled upon by the gymnasium commander, who will evaluate your son's physical fitness and talents for sports. Oral and written entrance examinations are in biology and social sciences with emphasis on the theory and methodology of physical education. The practical part of entrance examinations consists of swimming, gymnastics, track athletics and some sports games which are specified in accordance with the entrance proceedings every year. During the study at VO FTVS UK, the student must master also skiing and skating. Upon completion of studies, the graduates are sent as physical education instructors to military units, formations, schools and CSLA establishments.

[Question by Lubomir Vojtek, Stara Tura] The high standard of our military medicine is well known. Where do the physicians acquire such broad technical theoretical knowledge and practical experience?

[Answer] Military physicians are educated at the J.E. Purkyne Military Institute for Medical Research and Advanced Training in Hradec Kralove. The study in the department of general medicine lasts 6 years and in the department of stomatology and pharmacy 5 years. The institute closely cooperates with the Medical Faculty of Charles University in Hradec Kralove.

WRITERS' DEFENSE OF BIERMANN, CONSEQUENCES RECOUNTED

Protest Action's Development, Consequences

Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German Vol 35 No 48, 23 Nov 81 pp 86-87, 90, 92, 94, 96-98, 101-103, 106, 108

/Article by Karl-Heinz Jakobs, dissident GDR writer in FRG: "'We Will Never Forget Their Big Mouths'—GDR Author Karl-Heinz Jakobs on East German Writers and Biermann's Deprivation of Citizenship"/

> /Text/ The relationship between the artistic community and the SED regime was severely shaken by the expulsion from the GDR of songwriter Wolf Biermann. 13 GDR artists, joined by hundreds of others, protested against Biermann's expatriation. Numerous writers, musicians and actors left their homeland for good; more than a dozen others obtained permission to take up residence in the West for an extended period of time. Novelist Karl-Heinz Jakobs, one of those involved at the time, provides this account of what the relations between the SED and the GDR writers' community were in the aftermath of Biermann's expulsion. Jakobs, too, is now living in the FRG.

On the morning of 17 November 1976, Heym called up Hermlin to discuss the news item and the commentary that appeared in that day's newspaper. Heym asked Hermlin whether they should not take action to protest the expatriation. Hermlin thought they should but had no idea of what the two of them might actually do. Heym got the impression that Hermlin dreaded the consequences. They hung up without having agreed on a course of action.

3 hours later, Hermlin called up Heym and asked him to come over. He said he had given the matter more thought and now wanted to talk things over. When Heym arrived at Hermlin's apartment, he was surprised to find others of his colleagues already there. Hermlin had prepared the draft of a protest resolution and proposed to turn it over to the French news agency where he had good friends, he said.

Those in attendance said they were prepared to sign the document. Only Christa Wolf asked for 10 minutes to think things over and retired to an adjoining room.

When she came back, she asked whether it would not be preferable to appeal to Honecker directly. This suggestion was turned down on the grounds that such an appeal would have no effect whatsoever. Only a quick and courageous expression of protest over the Western media held any promise of success. It was decided to provide both NEUES DEUTSCHLAND and Agence France Presse (AFP) with a copy of the protest, with the former being given priority on publication.

In order to make sure, a 3-hour embargo was placed on AFP. Christa Wolf argued that the embargo was too short; but her motion did not carry. There followed some discussion as to who else might be persuaded to put his name to the document. When they called up Dr Hacks, he turned them down saying he had not yet taken leave of his senses. Fritz Cremer, just released from hospital on a trial basis, said he would sign. To everyone's surprise, Rolf Schneider just happened to drop in then and proceeded to sign the document immediately.

Gerhard Wolf and Hermlin then took the letter they all had signed and drove to sculptor Cremer's house. The only change he suggested was that the words "we demand" in the last paragraph should be replaced by "we ask." His suggestion was complied with and from that point on the protest was turned into a petition. Cremer also said: who are we to make demands on the party.

Gerhard Wolf and Hermlin told Cremer several times they had not come to pressure him but merely to talk things over so that he would not say later he had been passed over.

Each time Cremer said: no, don't worry. I am for it. When Gerhard Wolf and Hermlin had already said goodbye to him, Cremer called after them: yes, the way the text now reads, I am for it. It is hard to say whether Cremer knew or sensed which way the petition would go.

After they left Cremer's house, Hermlin and Schneider drove to the NEUES DEUTSCHLAND building and left the document with the doorman, pointing out to him that it should be brought to the editor-in-chief's attention immediately. In a covering letter, emphasis was made of the significance of the document. After that, Hermlin and Schneider took the list of signatures to the Frenchman. It was now exactly 2.30 pm.

By the time the document landed on Honecker's desk it was 6 pm; the embargo had run out a half-hour earlier. By then, the text was already being circulated by the Western media and even if he had wanted to, Honecker no longer was free to make a decision. Lateron, there would be a great deal of dispute concerning this half-hour gap. Didn't the party and didn't Erich himself deserve more confidence than the 3 hours the embargo provided, the minister of culture asked the Berlin writers on 23 November on the verge of tears. The petition, he said, expressly stated that thought should be given to the measure decided upon. How was one to reflect on something with a 3-hour embargo hanging over one's head ? Would it not have been fairer to give Erich at least 12 hours' time ?

Or 24 hours, someone called out from the floor. Or 4 days, cried another. Or 4 years, shouted a provocateur.

By this time, 110 cultural figures had put their name to the petition. The SED leadership, worried about the possibility of the protest's widening, put pressure on the signers to withdraw their names.

Among the 35 writers, there were 10 SED members and one member of the party leadership. For this reason, it became the job of the Berlin party organization above all to get the petitioners to return to the fold of disciplined party members and citizens. Toward this end, four party meetings were scheduled in all, the first one taking place on 23 November.

It became known that the minister of culture promised the aged, ailing Cremer that his imprisoned son-in-law would be released, if the sculptor publicly stated that he was pressured into signing and was withdrawing his name for that reason.

At the first party meeting, the minister of culture very excitedly waved a document on the podium, offering one and all to have a look at it. It stated that Cremer's son-in-law was released 12 hours prior to the time that Cremer declared his signature to be null and void. He kept on waving the document; but no one wanted to read it.

The second party meeting at the Berlin writers' union took place on 26 November. On the next day, Honecker asked Hermlin to stop by and showed him a handwritten slip of paper which contained only one sentence: It was a mistake for us to turn to an imperialist news service.

Honecker then asked Hermlin to sign the piece of paper, saying that he needed the statement for the next plenum of the central committee. He added that he wanted to prevent the central committee from adopting measures which might lead to a confrontation between the writers and the party as in December 1965. If Hermlin signed, he would be able to placate the plenum in the sense that this time the writers were willing and aole to work out the situation that had arisen in their union all by themselves.

Honecker asked Hermlin why he had not gone to him directly on 17 November. Hermlin replied by saying he knew that Honecker was at an important meeting at the time and that the petition simply could not be held up. If you had let me know, Honecker then said, I would have come out of any meeting, however important.

At this stage, Hermlin altered Honecker's wording to: it was my mistake...Honecker called his secretary into the room and gave the handwritten paper to copy on the typewriter. Hermlin asked that no carbon copy be made of the typewritten statement which, he said, was meant only for Honecker to present to the plenum.

At the opening of the first party disciplinary proceedings shortly before Christmas 1976, each accused was shown a text signed by Hermlin—whoever approved of it would have nothing to fear. What they did not know was that this text was a fake not identical with the sentence Honecker was to present to the central committee. They thought Hermlin had had a change of heart; but none of them signed the statement.

When Hermlin learned of the bogus text that was meant to sway his five colleagues, he handed a statement to the party leadership of the Berlin writers' union and to SED district headquarters in Berlin repudiating the sentence he had jointly composed with Honecker. A few days later, he repudiated the repudiation of the repudiation.

Party proceedings were also instituted against Hermlin. At the third party meeting, which took place immediately thereafter, he was penalized with a severe reprimand. At this point, he was faced with new proceedings since by repudiating his repudiated repudiation he was indirectly accusing Honecker of blackmail and treachery and both the party leadership and the district organization of falsifying documents.

Everything Honecker and Hermlin talked about and wrote in private has undergone correction several times since. At first, word was that Hermlin had expressly forbidden Honecker to make use of the altered sentence anywhere but in the central committee. But now word is that the content of their private conversation was not reported in full.

The truth is that Honecker did ask Hermlin whether he would permit him to present the jointly composed sentence to the party leadership of the writers' union and that Hermlin agreed.

And when the party leadership had the text in hand, Hermlin was asked whether it could not also be shown to those of his colleagues against whom party proceedings were to begin that day so as to give them a chance to disengage themselves from the petition without losing face.

Hermlin accepted that line of argument. In other words, the way things happened was not the way he said at first—that a bogus text was circulated without his knowing or agreeing to it.

I think the first version is correct. I think Hermlin was subsequently persuaded to accept the second version. If he had indeed agreed to have the paper he had worked out with Honecker shown to his five associates at the start of the party proceedings against them, he would not have had to repudiate his repudiation later on.

Now everyone testifies to the authenticity of the repudiation of his repudiation. And it is a fact as well that new party proceedings were already pending with the aim, this time, of expelling him from the party..

But what need was there to move for his ouster, if superhuman efforts had just succeeded in not having the man who initiated the petition expelled from the party—the author of the petition, the man who had blackmailed Cremer, the man who had handcarried the petition to the French ?

There is no information on the contents of the repudiated repudiation. The new party proceedings were not instituted only because Hermlin later repudiated the repudiated repudiation.

What took place at the third party meeting shortly before Christmas 1976 tends to bear this theory out. Like other meetings of the SED district organization, this one, too, was secretly and undisturbedly recorded on film and on tape.

Originally, the Berlin party secretary, Mr Naumann, had wanted to have the hall secured by a combat group unit, a uniformed, heavily-armed outfit trained for civil war and patterned after the Nazi storm troops. But by the time of the meeting, the party members were so cowed that he could dispense with the plan.

The first two against whom proceedings were instituted were given a reprimand; but Hermlin, the actual initiator of the petition, its author, the man who carried it to the French news service himself, was given a severe reprimand. This was a clear indication of the conciliatory nature of this party meeting. There can be no more severe punishment than that meted out to Hermlin.

The next motion was one calling for expulsion; it was directed against Gerhard Wolf. Now that was the real sensation on that day—when it became apparent that others were to be sacrificed in Hermlin's stead. The man who was most surprised by it was Gerhard Wolf who had just been told by Hermlin that the quasi joint Honecker-Hermlin text shown to him at the start of the proceedings was in fact a forgery prepared by the district organization.

Wolf excitedly urged Hermlin to clear things up immediately; but Hermlin merely shook his head. Gerhard Wolf was expelled from the party. After the meeting, Gerhard Wolf confronted Hermlin once more and categorically asked him to uncover the forgery. But Hermlin told him he could not do that since he had given his word to Honecker that he would keep mum so as not to jeopardize the latter's mission at the central committee.

Wieland Herzfelde brought a bit of levity into the proceedings when he suddenly said he could not understand why Guenther Ruecker was being expelled from the party while the traitor Hermlin was not.

Those who sat next to him informed him that it was not Guenther Ruecker but Gerhard Wolf which prompted Herzfelde to exclaim: that makes no difference to me—they cannot expel Guenther Ruecker and leave Hermlin, the traitor to the party, unscathed.

Once again those next to him try to clear up the confusion by saying that it is Gerhard Wolf who is being expelled but Herzfelde only got angrier. This really is the end, he said: Guenther Ruecker is being ousted and Hermlin who has been stabbing the party in the back for a long time is not.

The original motion directed against Jurek Becker called for striking his name from the party rolls. This new, extremely clever tactical maneuver served to confuse everyone, particularly Gerhard Wolf who thought he was being betrayed by one and all, since he would be stamped as the actual initiator and main consiprator, if he alone were expelled.

This got him very excited but Becker placated him by saying: don't worry, they will expel me, too. He then made a brief, powerful declaration whereupon the original motion was retracted and a new motion made and before he knew it, Becker, too, was expelled. Saran Kirsch's name was stricken from the party rolls.

The only addendum to the proceedings involving the petition would be the visit of the GDR minister of culture in Moscow. Immediately after the petition became public, the minister of culture was summoned to Moscow. First, he told his Soviet counterpart just who it was that was being expelled: the son of Jewish parents from Hamburg who came to the GDR in 1953 and then made a name for himself by writing poems against the party and its representatives. The minister was then asked how such an unknown could suddenly be catapulted to the center of the world stage. The minister had come prepared for just such a question. He took out a book published in the Soviet Union containing Wolf's name, who was not so unknown after all. The minister of culture later confided to his closest associates that he neglected to tell his counterpart that Wolf's poems were included only in the first edition of the book, having been withdrawn subsequently at the author's own request.

But the Soviet official still could not understand what it was all about. Since everyone knows this official to be an anti-Semite, the minister of culture said: the whole business has become a purely Jewish affair in the meantime. One look at the list would show they were all Jews or at least most of them. The non-Jews were the ones being led astray. In bad times, he said, the Jews were loyal to the party, as the Soviet official knew only too well; but in liberal times they tended to get out of line. But this would soon change.

As for Heym, his involvement could be explained in another way: he had served in American intelligence during the war and, as the Soviet official no doubt knew—once a secret agent, always a secret agent.

The Petoefi circle in Hungary in 1956, the Czech chartists in 1968 and the 1976 petitioners were all alike, guided from the outside, aiming to destroy the achievements of socialism and to establish a Trotskyite (social democratic ? my notes on this subject are not clear) system instead. But in the GDR, he said, the party fought back in time and thereby saved the Red Army from having to intervene. We gave proof to the Soviet Union, the minister said, that stable conditions prevail in the GDR and that we are quite capable of dealing with our problems ourselves.

The idea that the petition was not spontaneous but instigated by outside elements came up soon after it was published as did the idea that its content was only meant on paper to get the expelled poet to come back.

The question is: instigated from what quarter, by whom ? And: what was the real purpose of the petition ?

The way the text was phrased and then was made public, no government in the world —except for a Polish government in a state of extreme weakness—could have ventured to fulfill the demands contained in the document.

This chronology has been written for the purpose of finding answers to this question.

This is how Mr Naumann, the first secretary of the Berlin district SED organization saw it: It is interesting to see just who comes crawling out of his rat's nest all of a sudden. But the working class merely has to put its foot down hard just once and look at them scurrying back to their holes. We have their number now and we will not forget their big mouths. And all those that don't beat it, we will crush underfoot.

Chairman Goerlich, for his part, views the petition in an entirely different light.

At the first party meeting of the Berlin writers, he had this to say: During the course of 1976, the FRG intensified the ideological confrontation continuously in order to establish a favorable starting position vis-a-vis the GDR at the Belgrade follow-up conference. It did everything in its power to step up the civil rights campaign in the GDR and to incite innocent citizens to leave the country.

Immediately prior to the Bundestag elections, Kunze's book "The Wonderful Years" was published. Among those taking part in the Bochum initiative calling for "freedom of expression—freedom to travel" were politicians like Bahr, Eppler and Schuetz as well as the GDR traitor Heinz Brandt and anti-communists such as Dutschke and Flechtheim.

The aforementioned artist, on whose behalf freedom to travel was being demanded, offered himself as a tool for this provocation. In order to prepare himself for his trip tactically and strategically, he had 14 days time (or is it years ? I cannot decipher the word in my notes). The performance he gave was not a concert but an anti-communist commentary interspersed with songs.

On what occasions, for that matter, did the ARD alter its evening program schedule so radically because of fast-breaking events ? At the time of Adenauer's death, Kennedy's assassination or the events in Hungary ?

There was no applause during Goerlich's speech; nor was there a word of protest. In his case, the question always is whether he believes what he says. In effect, he committed a political mistake which the minister of culture corrected shortly thereafter by taking all the blame upon himself, by stepping into the breach created by Goerlich's overzealousness.

Ever since the currency reform and the establishment of the FRG, it has been the SED's trauma to appear merely to be reacting to the opponent in the people's eyes and not to be able to adopt politically farsighted measures on its own. That has something to do with the fact that it always has something to hide.

The truth is that the SED has been on the offensive ever since it was founded but that its actions were always in contrast to the content of its propaganda. Thus, it denied the existence of the barracked people's police for years in the mistaken belief not to be able to admit it while publicly arguing against the militarization of Germany.

What Goerlich did was to portray the GDR government and the SED as innocent victims of the FRG—employing a line of argument meant to arouse pity but merely succeeding in undermining the leadership role of the party.

Five more speakers in the same vein followed Goerlich and none were applauded. It was as if the audience were paralyzed. Holtz-Baumert asked that the petitioners not be castigated but be helped instead. Everyone was amazed. 3 days later, at the second party meeting, he was to jump up, his voice wild with rage. Kerndl said: from today onward we must try to clear up a good deal of our relationship to each other and to the party.

A woman named Wiebach, whom I did not know, accused the chastised poet of lying. She said that no one had ever been thrown in jail in the GDR for telling a political joke. She said she knew that very well, since she was a court employee. Even she was unable to move anyone to expressing mirth or displeasure. Kammitzer said he could see people protesting against some perceived injustice. Unfortunately, the petitioners had failed to realize, he said, that the man subsequently banished for good reason had committed serious misdeeds. In fact, he should have been haled into court but that would have unleashed a hate campaign against the GDR. Under the circumstances, it was best to expatriate him.

All of those who took the floor appear to have been motivated by the painful desire to justify the actions of the party, to plead for understanding.

Noll said he thought the party had played the enemy's game by expatriating the man. Perhaps, he said, the matter should have been thought over but once the ultimatum was out, there was no way back. How can we possibly get back together again, he cried saying that he did not know what was to be done.

For the first time that afternoon there was a reaction from the audience. You have been in the party for 30 years now, Li Weinert shouted; you ought to know what is to be done.

Everyone turned around to look at her; everyone stared at her without saying a word.

When Anna Seghers went to the lectern, she was received with long, loud and cordial applause. It almost seemed that the interruption from the floor had awakened those in the hall from their stupor.

There were many who did not join in the applause. She has always openly said what she thought and driven the functionaries to distraction. Even when everyone else was silent as they were on that day, she spoke her mind.

But anyone who believed he might join her side was disappointed. On that day, she did not resume her seat after delivering her speech, which was a tough one for the functionaries to take, but smiled to the left and the right and then waved and made her way slowly home. It is said that she escaped two assassination attempts by hair's breadth while in exile in Mexico.

Hermlin was her friend, Seghers said; he still was—just the same, she had to criticize him. The worst part of it is, she said, that my friends gave the letter to the foreign press. How could my best friends be so stupid ? There has been a lot of duplicity over the last few days, she said. My friends have cheated and the functionaries, too, have cheated.

My friends cheated on the question about which agency they contacted. Did they contact the West German agency ?

Hermlin: No.

Seghers: To the French agency ?

Hermlin: Yes.

Is it true, Seghers asked, that one cannot debate issues all the way through in our country. There was no doubt that the expatriated poet had great talent; nor was there any doubt that his was a dangerous talent. He was like a Brazilian macumba that bewitches people. Now, she said, he will run completely out of steam.

Is there no way of talking things out in our country, Seghers asked over and over again. Why was this terrible ban on performing and publishing slapped on this young man ? Why wasn't a way found after the 8th party congress to get closer to this man and to settle the matter peaceably ?

Why didn't anyone speak to him before he left for Cologne ? Every little songstress who wants to go abroad cannot leave until her program has been expressly approved. But this man was permitted to leave without a word. Why ?

Or was all this part of a plan ? Did one hope that Biermann would make some gaffe in Cologne ? Was he let out for that reason ? Could all this have been part of a plan to silence an opponent of some stature ?

At that point, there was a third reaction from the floor. It was Gotsche, red-faced, with beads of perspiration on his forehead, shouting something. I could only catch one word but would not want to repeat it here because I cannot attest to his having said it. It had something to do with firearms. There were frightened faces all around.

Seghers turned to him directly, even taking two small steps in the direction of where he was sitting. I know you, Gotsche, she said. I have told you before that you are harmful to the party. What you have just said also is harmful to the party.

Why didn't you get in touch with me until after the whole business was over, she asked. Young people come to my house and ask: who is there that will still tell us the truth. I do not think, she said, that you functionaries have any idea what is really being said in people's homes.

The petitioners should not be punished, she said pointing out that many valuable people had added their names to the petition trusting in the good name of the original signatories, in their sincerity and sense of responsibility. Any punishment of the original signers or of those who joined in later would severely damage the party.

The worst appeared to be over, she said. The content of the petition had changed in a strange way. It was as if the request to let the banished poet return had never been made.

By now, she said, it is merely a question of whether it is right to punish the petitioners or not. None of the speakers bothered to note that the new "free choice of domicile—freedom to return" initiative was more or less identical with the contents of the petition.

A Mr Klein, whom I did not know, deplored the fact that the party was always concerning itself with critics and dissidents but never with authors who hewed to the party line. Henniger came up with an insipid tirade saying that it looked as if the petitioners were worried about their bank accounts in the West. Hermlin took the floor to speak without emotion about Heine, himself and the history of the petition.

The debate began to fall apart; there was little left to say. Just then the minister of culture rushed to the lectern with such a burst of speed he almost fell. He said he had been behind the move to expatriate Biermann for some time. No one else but he was responsible for what had happened. He listened to Biermann's Cologne performance on the radio and subsequently urged that the matter be expedited.

This was a matter being debated at the highest levels of the party for a good while. Its eventual outcome predetermined, it was to be made public most expeditiously.

This would seem to indicate that they meant to let the man dangle a while longer; to await the end of his tour; to wait for him to provide more proof.

But what if only his first performance could be characterized as an "anti-communist commentary interspersed with songs" with a bit of imagination ? What if he restricted himself to pure anti-fascism thereafter ?

Then the whole plan would be for naught. It was known at any rate that the songwriter had been pressured by friends. Originally, he had assembled an anti-fascist program but his friends had thrown it out saying that he could not hope to make a hit that way in his first appearance in 13 years over there.

Later, the NEUES DEUTSCHLAND commentator was hard put to characterize Biermann's continuous praise of communism as "massive attacks against our socialist state."

The actual outcome of this party meeting then was the involuntary admission that a trap had been laid for the songwriter. Everybody knew it but no one was willing to admit it.

When Peter Edel strode to the lectern, several people groaned in dismay. Everybody knew what was coming; no one listened but everyone looked at his mouth suffused with white foam. The foam, however, is not the result of anger but of plaster of paris, since Edel, also known as an artist, uses that substance to make a new cast of his teeth every morning for fear of having to see the dentist.

With regard to Hermlin, there were two groups of party and cultural leaders irreconcilably opposed to each other. The one group wanted to punish the man for something he had done and the other wanted to reward him for something in which he might not knowingly have participated.

I have already mentioned which of the two groups carried the day at first: they let him off with a severe reprimand. Later, he was given the patriotic order of merit in gold.

After the minister of culture accused Hermlin of having blackmailed ailing Cremer —a fact Cremer testified to expressly in a letter to Hermlin—he went on to cite other misdeeds of his high-ranking opponent charging him with collaborating with the enemy and having sold out to the enemy.

Under Stalin, either accusation would have sufficed to hand the man over to the firing squad. But times are different and for that reason the minister of culture had to come up with still more evidence.

At the PEN congress in London, he said, Hermlin had voted for an American resolution censuring the Soviet Union at a time when the imperialist powers were engaged in a world-wide offensive against the socialist countries.

Later, Hermlin defended himself in a long, halting speech. Soviet writers had been sentenced and deported for having their works published abroad. That is what the American protest was about. He had voted for the resolution to show his support for the imprisoned Soviet colleagues. He had felt justified to do so, since Amnesty International for the first time had not included the GDR in its annual report citing countries whose citizens were being persecuted for political reasons.

The minister of culture also pointed out that Hermlin had joined the West Berlin academy of arts and sciences without first notifying the minister. He had only mentioned it in passing once it was a fait d'accompli. In this regard, he had acted even more shabbily than Kunze who did ask for the minister's approval prior to joining the Bavarian academy of fine arts.

By using a rhetorical trick, the minister of culture succeeded in making it appear that substantial payments were part of academy membership, forcing Hermlin to point out that the West Berlin body does not pay out funds in his rebuttal.

All this, as I have said, was discussed on 23 November 1976. 150 authors put in an appearance at this party meeting and were forced to witness a peep show by their party and cultural elite.

No mention was made of the fact that Juergen Fuchs had already spent 4 days in jail for having added his name to the petition, thereby placing his trust in the sincerity and sense of responsibility of the original signers.

Nor was any mention made of the fact that the two songwriters Christian Kunert and Gerulf Pannach had spent 2 days in jail by then.

Or that young poets and poetesses, whether they signed the petition or not, were fearfully rushing from place to place hiding their manuscripts while being pursued by state security agents in automobiles.

All this was known and was being passed on by word of mouth during the intermissions; but no one dared to shout it out in anger or to ask that the persecution be reconsidered.

That evening I said to Christa Wolf that Fuchs sent me his poems a month earlier. What do you think I should do with them, I asked. Burn them, she said.

This account includes a good deal that may sound melodramatic or like political pornography. Later on for instance, I will copy the following entry out of my notebook: "At that point, he started to cry. He rubbed his eyes, swallowed several times and began to leave the podium. He took a few steps and stopped, lowering his head. It seemed he could not go on—he was so deeply moved. But applause here and there in the hall made him return to the empty lectern."

That is how I will later present details of the drama in order to give an impression of the general mood and the fight itself. I can even say how long the individual scenes lasted, since the events had such a sobering effect on me that I was able to consult my watch and time them.

The one who led the fight to punish Hermlin was the minister of culture; the one who led the fight to reward him was Hermann Kant. The former bet everything on the first meeting on 23 November; the latter bet everything on the second meeting on 26 November.

On 26 November all petitioners were present with the exception of Christa Wolf who suffered a heart attack on the way to the meeting.

The minister of culture had this to say: who counts the heart attacks that we all suffer ?

At the previous party meeting, Bengsch had announced he would address this one. He proceeded to analyze the situation as a counter-revolution that has collapsed.

Those who signed the petition, he said, wanted to establish a social democratic platform in the GDR. They had revealed themselves as remote control tools of the SPD. It was thanks to the resolute action by the party that the attempt to create social democratic conditions in the GDR was thwarted.

He also told the audience what price the banished poet had set on betraying the GDR—it ran to six figures.

A woman named Steineckert related that she saw level-headed, grown people in the street in the past few days who broke down and cried about the fact that a mere dozen authors had succeeded in maneuvering the party to the edge of the abyss. She had also heard people say that the German lied would wither away for 100 years now the poet and singer was banished.

But she pointed out that this will not happen—neither in 50 years, nor in 10, nor even in one year or one day. No doubt she had access to a whole brood of songwriters. She then recounted intimate details concerning her long-standing friendship with the banished man whom she called an unprincipled cad.

Every effort made by the cultural authorities to approach him were turned down by him maliciously, she said. She then quoted him as saying he did not want to publish in this god-forsaken country. He wanted to go to jail instead, write a prison diary and receive the Nobel Prize.

He called Ernst Busch a senile old goat; he wrote a long poem composed of critical remarks by others and then sent a tape of it to the minister of culture, denouncing some of his best friends in the process.

By this time, there was no more mention of thinking things over, of reflecting on them or of thinking as such. A deluge of rhetoric went cascading down on the assemblage. Baierl and Hauser just talk and talk. Eva Strittmatter was given the job of defending the resolution to be passed. One could see how hard it was for her; there were red blotches all over her face and later that evening she would have a crying fit.

The petitioners then went into lengthy explanations of what they don't like about the party, what the party has done to them and why they could not, cannot and will not keep silent any longer; how they came to join the party and what they expected of it.

Once upon a time, Kunert said, Dr Bauer told me: you may not be able to finish off the party but the party can certainly finish you off. Dr Bauer, who sat with the presidium, just smiled and shook his head as if to say: what a bald-faced lie. In fact, it was not a bad acting job at all.

Hermann Kant jumped to his aid. Dr Roland Bauer is my friend, he cried; I believe him rather than Kunert. No one rose to protect Kunert from this attack by two of the most notorious hatchet men

Gerhard Wolf then quoted from a letter his wife had written to the party: Once upon a time, a leading party member told me you can compose a fiery protest against the war the Americans are waging in Vietnam but we will not publish it. Once again Dr Bauer shook his head—in someone else's stead this time because he was not even the one under attack.

At that point someone else should have shaken his head—someone the audience might really have trusted. Under the circumstances, everyone could tell that things were indeed the way Wolf had just quoted. Dr Bauer's vehement denial gave proof of the fact that the incident had been correctly reported.

These were recollections by Kunert and Wolf dating back to the somber December of 1965 when the party cracked the whip over the best of its poets and silenced them for years. Everyone of us has similar recollections.

So does Hermlin who on another occasion elsewhere told of how he was not permitted to go to the West and when the permission was finally granted, how he was summoned by a high cultural functionary who said to him: we can deal with you as we did with Bishop Scharf. You can take your trip now but when you want to come back, perhaps the door will be closed for you.

It is pretty much as I said. Anyone who signed the petition did not do so in order to bring a banished poet back into the country. There are a lot of imponderables in cases such as these. 10, sometimes 15 or 20 years of tacitly suffered injustice are reflected in a little, innocent piece of paper that later goes by the name of petition. The party knows what is in store when it takes a look at the names of the signers. But it also knows the human beings behind the signatures and it knows this particular person must be treated in such and such a way to obtain such and such results and this other one must be treated differently—each according to his individual character.

There were lots of farewell speeches on this 26 November. When Hermann Kant mounted the podium, Ruth Werner clapped demonstratively. She clapped and clapped but no one joined in the applause.

Although it seemed somewhat unmotivated at first, he started to philosophize about friendship in general and about his friendship with Hermlin in particular. Friendships are like that, he said—one fights with each other; one does not see each other for a while sometimes, but in such friendships there never comes a moment...

The audience crouched and listened; people looked at each other questioningly as if to say: I can't trust my ears or maybe I've come to the wrong meeting; maybe this is the boys scouts. Is this man on the podium really forcing us to listen to him ? Is there no one who will get up and take the microphone away from him ?

No one dared. The machinery of this meeting was too well oiled for that. Kurt Stern had said he would have signed the petition too, if he had been in the country while it was being circulated. In response, Hauser shouted clear across the hall: I don't understand, Kurt. Does that mean you want to be expelled, too ?

That was the kind of language being used on that 26 November— that language and the language of the man on the podium.

Kant went on to say he had just returned from Moscow and his first concern was for his friend Hermlin. He could not describe his deep satisfaction upon hearing that his friend had disassociated himself from the course the petition had taken to the imperialist media. He had learned that Hermlin called it a mistake to have gone to the imperialist news service and that he would bear the consequences for this act, if asked to do so.

Kant used even more moving language to describe the decades-long friendship and the sorrow which took hold of him when he heard of Hermlin's terrible blunder. He was close to tears; he wiped his eyes, swallowed several times and began to leave the podium (4 seconds). He then took a few steps, lowering his head and stopped. It seemed he could not go on—hewas so moved (7 seconds). But applause here and there in the hall made him return to the empty lectern (5 seconds).

This is how Hermlin was saved for the GDR. He himself later corrected Kant's interpretation of the fateful sentence. He had not said: it was my mistake that we turned to the imperialist news service. That was the wording contained in the handwritten note for comrade Honecker. The sentence my friend Hermann Kant was referring to, he said, pausing momentarily to fight off tears, actually read: if it was a mistake for me to...then I am ready to accept the consequences.

In this fussy manner he corrected Kant's version but who was there in the hall that could still perceive and see through the fine web of duplicity.

At the same time that these semantic games were taking place, 40 Jena workers and students had already been arrested for having signed the petition trusting in the good name, the sincerity and the sense of reponsibility of the original signers.

And at that very moment the name of the poet Bernd Jentzsch was added to the list of wanted persons because his open letter to Honecker had become public. He was the first of more than 100 writers and artists who managed to cross over to the West from the GDR over the next 5 years.

Writers were smuggling their notes and manuscripts across the border and those that could not either buried or burned them.

In state security interrogation rooms, works of art, diaries, manuscripts, letters, sheet music and phonograph records were piling up.

And so Kant assumed power. Until then, Erwin Strittmatter and Christa Wolf were considered the only two possible candidates for the post of president of the writers' union once it was announced that Anna Seghers was ready to step down.

After Kant rescued Hermlin from the threat of having to emigrate, he also saved Christa Wolf's skin a few weeks later who insisted on being punished like her husband through expulsion from the party. In influencing her, he employs somewhat crude methods, telling her he just could not stand all these ugly faces around him. He would become more and more isolated in the process, he said; he would rather have honest faces around.

The ugly faces he was referring to are those of Gotsche, Neutsch, Abusch, Schulz, Noll and others. He then proceeded to work on Christa Wolf until he had weakened her powers of discernment sufficiently for her to make a statement the import of which she seemed not to realize. Under the then prevailing conditions, she said, the document we composed in Hermlin's apartment and subsequently on 17 November represented the only conceivable possibility to react to a state of affairs she had come to view as unjust. But this procedure could not be repeated indiscriminately.

This is what she said on a January day in 1977. Hermann Kant jumped up and applauded her.

Writers' Petition

/Inserted text of 17 November 1976 open letter signed by 13 GDR writers: "The Petition"/

> /Text/ After Wolf Biermann had performed songs critical of his homeland at a concert in Cologne and the GDR had abrogated his citizenship for that reason, 13 East German writers and artists addressed the following open letter to SED chief Erich Honecker on 17 November 1976:

Wolf Biermann was and still is an irksome poet—he has that in common with many a poet of the past.

In recognition of the argument contained in Marx'"18th Brumaire," which states that the proletarian revolution must constantly be criticizing itself, our socialist state should, in contrast to anachronistic social systems, be in a position to tolerate such irksomeness with deliberative equanimity.

We do not identify with every word and every action of Biermann's and disassociate ourselves from attempts to make use of the events surrounding Biermann against the GDR. Biermann himself has never left any doubt, even while in Cologne, about which of the two German states he favors—all his criticism notwithstanding.

We protest against his expatriation and therefore ask that the measures adopted be reconsidered.

DISSIDENT WRITER DISCUSSES STEFAN HEYM'S LATEST WORK

Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German Vol 35 No 45, 2 Nov 81 pp 240, 242, 243, 246

["Jurek Becker on Stefan Heym: 'Ahasver'--The Wandering Jew Is Never Silent'—Review by Jurek Becker of "Ahasver," book by Stefan Heym, published by C. Bertelsmann Verlag, Munich; 320 pages, DM34.00. A translation of an interview with Stefan Heym by DER SPIEGEL editors in West Berlin is published under the Heading, "Stefan Heym Discusses Socialism, 'Abgrenzung,' Censorship," in JPRS 77013, 16 Dec 80, No 1834 of this series, pp 6-17]

> [Text] Novelist Stefan Heym ("Collin"), 68, who emigrated to East Berlin from exile in America in 1951 was expelled from the GDR authors' league in 1978; since then his books have been published only in the West. Author Jurek Becker ("Nach der ersten Zukunft"), 44, lives as a GDR citizen in West Berlin.

For a long time after Stefan Heym had published his novel "Collin" little attention was paid to the book until a strange event took place: because he violated the GDR's foreign exchange law, justice there presented Heym with criminal proceedings. And before you knew it the flop turned into a best seller because the book trade does not hesitate for long. It must be feared that the GDR authorities will not let themselves become involved again in such a generous gesture. That would be a great pity because "Ahasver" is far more deserving of getting on the list. It has become a magnificent book.

The author's basic idea is to act as if his story were dealing with factual materials, as if he had succeeded in gaining access to documents which finally shed a little light on certain events: what the facts of the devil's existence are, what artifices the devil uses in order to blur the lines between good and evil and right and wrong, in which direction hell is presumed to be, and the like. Anyone who doubts facts cannot be helped.

On the other hand, the author is naturally telling a story, this is nowhere denied, stories have their own logic which is not as simple as that which holds for everyday logic; factual material from the world of literature is of a special quality which can scarcely be precisely characterized. If someone were to come along with the surveyor's rod of science, with historical proofs or excavations or the standards of probability, he would only make a fool of himself and stand out as someone who did not comprehend the nature of the thing. For stories cannot be right or wrong, but only good or bad.

Ahasver was a Jewish shoemaker, Via Dolorosa, Jerusalem. When Jesus, while dragging the cross to Golgatha, came to the shoemaker's house and stopped in order to rest there, he chased him away from his door. Jesus cursed him, Ahasver was condemned to wander on the earth, restlessly, until the Savior's return. The shoemaker Ahasver developed into the Eternal Jew, in the course of the centuries he repeatedly reappeared, in varying guise, in various parts of the world, and was recognized without any doubt by witnesses. In times when there was less mistrust than there is today, deceivers exploited the good belief in the legend, pretended to be the Eternal Jew and collected charitable gifts wherever they were trusted.

Stefan Heym used the real Ahasver as the model for an imposing new invention. His Ahasver, a fallen angel, does not simply reject the Savior in a narrow-minded way, but rather has reasons for doing it. He loves him, he is prepared to tear himself apart for him, he implores him to resist, to lay down the cross, to take the sword and fight against his tormentors. But Ahasver is not ready to yield against his conviction: this is the issue. He says: "Do you believe that it makes any difference to him up there if they drive nails through your hands and feet and let you die on the cross bit by bit? He made man as he is and you want to change man through your miserable death?"

Heym's Ahasver is one who refused to submit, who is not a sufferer like Jesus, but rather a subversive and revolutionary. He says to the Savior: "Rabbi, your humility sickens me." For that reason he refuses him the small bit of help, as a final argument, or, since all arguments are to no avail, out of disappointment. In return he must wander restlessly and eternally; and so? That does not amount to much in a world which is like it is, rather, he is more at home nowhere.

His attitude is stubborn and uncompromising, like that of the author. Although never impolitely, he gives no consideration to those who might be especially affected by stories of this kind. In church circles this may lead to irritations and opposition, no different from party circles.

A second part of the book, it could be called the present-day section, takes place at the time of the Reformation. Protestantism has taken hold in parts of Europe, an originally rebellious, revolutionary movement is established and itself becomes the authority. The ideals under which the whole thing was started decay, those newly in power oppress and blackmail and persecute in a manner no worse than their predecessors. From a distance the differences blur, naturally that is not so crude with Heym.

He tells a mysterious story. A Paul von Eitzen, an average person from Hamburg who as a young man believes in authority is successful in a nice theological career in the 16th century, he manages to become superintendent in Schleswig. The reader can, but does not need to, take note of the fact that there really was a Paul von Eitzen and that he resembles the one described. It is a luxury which the author allows himself, also an example of the cited coexistence of facts and bold assertion, the artistic piece of an inventor with rich resources.

In any case, on his way through life Eitzen experiences wonderful support. A certain Leuchtentrager, a chance travelling acquaintance, is infatuated with the pale young man and helps him in such an effective manner as no other could: he lets him pass tests with brilliance, he has sermons occur to him, he sets his loins on fire and is always there when he is needed. We the readers early come to the conclusion that this Leuchtentrager is not a being like you or me. From the way he walks (he limps), from the way he smells, from the way he arrives; mostly he does not even arrive, but rather is simply there. Thus, the devil, the only natural explanation.

He sponsors Eitzen, he elevates the dogmatist to high rank and honors so that he can represent Luther's teachings as a horrible judge. Thus, the Reformation takes on an appearance which its own founder will not ever recognize, the devil has had a hand in the matter. Finally, he arranges the meeting of Eitzen and the Eternal Jew. Ahasver, the changer, and Eitzen come across each other in many chapters. Anyone who makes such revolutionary speeches as Ahasver does not have the right to live in Superintendent Eitzen's opinion; and Eitzen has a lot of pull, clerical pull, which is also the influence of the state. Ahasver is condemned to death, but he has even more pull. We know he cannot die until Jesus returns.

About 20 years ago Anna Seghers wrote: "Can the devil once again become independent in a writing in our time? Not devoid of power, but without devil's attributes--he still often appears like that in art, as sort of a carnival ghost--but rather in full possession of his power, as a genuine symbol of negation. Can the devil once again be presented in an authentic manner, after Dostoyevski and Thomas Mann, as a reflection of a terribly tempting doubt which bewilders people today?"

The answer to this can be "yes," Heym has written this book, only he did completely change one condition of Segher's requirements. His devil, Ahasver's constant companion, is absolutely not the symbol of negation; he is not a "part of that power which always wants evil and always creates good," and not the spirit which always negates.

Leuchtentrager has thought up a more diabolical method: he supports people in their fruitless strivings. He affirms. He helps to preserve the God-ordained order because he sees that he could never establish a more wretched order. He enters service with the authorities and together with them hinders change, in this sense he is the opposite of Ahasver. Heym has given the figure a new dimension via the epistemological component: the devil Leuchtentrager is a participant in social events, as a reactionary.

In 1980 a learned correspondence is carried on concerning the existence of Ahasver, and though not stated, also concerning the existence of the devil; this is the third section of the book. Those involved in the correspondence are Prof Dr Dr h.c. Siegfried Beifuss, director of the GDR Institute for Scientific Atheism (which does not exist), and a professor from the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, who answers to the already familiar name of Leuchtentrager. Both have worked on Ahasver. But the one has the advantage of knowing Ahasvar personally, and we know which one. Ahasver, he claims, still lives today as a shoemaker in Jerusalem, Via Dolorosa.

The author's original purpose with the correspondence may have been to introduce the unschooled reader to the material; for who is an expert in the matter of the Ahasver legend? The result of this didactic intention (to the extent the assumption applies) is a pleasure, a mixture of scientific discussion, false friendliness and malicious wit. Experts exchange their views, draw conclusions only from facts which they reveal to us so that we do not have to grope in the dark; thus, the reader himself reaches conclusions. In addition, there develops a base satire on the intellectual atmosphere of a country which is in no way denegrated if it is termed repressive and moldy.

At first it is hard to understand how a relevant dispute can develop here: rarely did it seem so obvious who was right and who was wrong in a dispute. Just let somebody come to me and try to claim that a 2,000-year old Jewish shoemaker lives right around the corner from him, in fact, the very one who at the time refused the shade of his house to Jesus!

Yet in an obscure way that which every day is held to be true and just is invalidated, reality ceases to be reality. It changes into a condition in which the other rules hold, the tricky or cabbalistic ones. We learn to understand the incomprehensible, indeed, to view it as the only meaningful thing. Our experiences are multiplied by minus one.

On New Year's Eve night 1981 Dr Siegfried Beifuss is suddenly no longer there; two foreign gentlemen visited him without having passed the GDR border crossing points, and only two specific people were in a position to do that. In Beifuss' apartment, Leipzing Street, near Checkpoing Charlie, ninth floor, there is a hole in the wall; the two gentlemen disappeared with the director of the Institute for Scientific Atheism and only a touch of sulfur remained behind. The state organs stand perplexed in front of the hole and do not comprehend what happened there. But we, smarter by one book, can only wonder what there is not to understand about the matter when the state of affairs is so unambiguous.

It seems strange to me to maintain that Stefan Heym in telling the story of Ahasver is reporting about his own life. When should he have ever turned the Savior away from his door, and after all, he is not so old either, and in what different shapes should he have appeared? Nonetheless, it could be answered that it is not a matter of a photograph, and also that other, no less important details support the assumption.

Nonetheless, Heym is also an old Jew who does not look his age. And he, too, has been knocked about, persecuted, punished, called names, and nowhere properly tolerated. He, too, has little cause to feel at home. Yet mainly he has not lost hope and thinks that it must still be possible to make something out of the world. Two agitators who continuously receive a thrashing and who not on their lives give any peace of mind.

It would be a mistake to read "Ahasver" in such a way as if behind each word a different one had to be suspected, the one that was really meant. The search between or behind the lines will not enhance the value of the book, there is enough in the lines.

Of course "Ahasver" has a secret, as does every art, I would like to say, a mysterious one that attracts the reader. He must open himself to the mystery and not try to check up chapter by chapter. That is no doubt how the book will be read in the GDR Ministry for Culture before deciding not to print it; yet others should not read in this way.

When Ahasvar explains to the Savior "that truth is not located in any central places, but rather is visible to anyone who wants to see," then there is nothing to convey. The author clings strictly to this proposition because his book is unbelievable, but true.

Recently Stefan Heym said that God had helped him write down "Ahasver." I am completely convinced of it.

ROLE OF STATE IN MOVEMENT TOWARD COMMUNISM

Bucharest ANALE DE ISTORIE in Romanian No 4, (Jul-Aug) 1981 pp 16-32

[Article by Ion Ceterchi: "The Romanian Communist Party's View Regarding the Role of the Socialist State in Creating a Multilaterally Developed Socialist Society and Advancing the Country Towards Communism"]

[Text] The question of the state and its nature and role in the process of socialist revolution and the building of socialism and communism has a special theoretical and practical significance, a question to which the Romanian Communist Party accords a great importance.

As is known, the transition from capitalism to communism goes through different historical stages characterized by radical transformations of a structural and superstructural nature. During the course of this process, the socialist state is born and developed, changes take place in the social essence and basis of state power and the organization and functions of the state are improved and continually adapted according to the requirements of the each stage of society's development. For its part, the state exercises a significant role in the achievement of these transformations. Under the leadership of the communist party, the state constitutes a powerful political instrument for the creation of the economic and social structures of the new order and its ideology and for the conscious, scientific guidance of the giant effort of building socialism and communism.

The theory of scientific socialism reveals the cardinal significance of the workers' acquistion of state power, led by the working class, in order to ensure the victory and carrying out of the socialist revolution. The historical experience of the revolution and the building of the socialist order. although it is a view in the perspective of history that can be measure merely in decades, demonstrates that only by creating a new and powerful state that is superior and radical different in its social essence and the content and forms of its activities compared to the preceding types of states can the working class guide and organize the fulfillment of the complex historical tasks of building socialism and communism and raising society to higher levels of civilization and culture.

In the context of the contemporary ideological struggle, an important place is held by dealing with the question of state power, a view which each working class party forms with regards to the place, role and essence of the state under the conditions of the socialist order. Both the revolutionary parties of the working class in the non-socialist countries, which are called upon to organize and carry out the struggle of the masses to bring about certain democratic and revolutionary changes in the direction of socialism under the conditions of the capitalist order or in numerous "third world" nations, and especially the governing communist parties in the socialist countries, which are at different stages of socialist construction, must formulate and specify their position with regards to the political system of the new order and especially with regards to the place, role and essence of the state within the framework of this system.

It can be said that today the position with regards to the role of the state and the concept about the characteristics of political power in socialism are the touchstone for the programs of the communist and workers parties and the subject of broad discussions. There is an even greater responsibility for the communist parties in the socialist countries, where the problem also has a direct practical aspect with consequences on a domestic and international level, with socialism having to prove in practice its superiority over the non-socialist political systems. Nothing can be more damaging than a rigid, dogmatic and non-creative attitude in this regard. On the contrary, the communist and workers parties must have a creative attitude by which they can develop and enrichen revolutionary theory. Comrade Nicolae Ceausescu points out: "The fundamental problem under the conditions of the contemporary era, which is characterized by the rapid development of the forces of production, by the broadest technical-scientific revolution and by a giant leap in human knowledge, is the continuing enrichment of scientific socialism and the growth of each party's contribution to the development of our revolutionary theory in accordance with the imperatives of the development of human society and social practices. Only in this manner will the communist parties and the revolutionary movement be able to even more powerfully develop and fulfill their historical mission to revolutionarily transform the world and ensure peace."[1]

Beginning with the realities of our country and with the materialist-dialectic analysis of economic, social and ideological transformations that are taking place in Romanian society and keeping in mind the relationship of forces on the international level, the Romanian Communist Party and its secretary general, comrade Nicolae Ceausescu, have formulated a clear position with regards to the socialist political system, the role and place of the state in this framework, the characteristics of state power, the relationships between the party as a leading political force in society and the state, between the state and mass and public organizations and between the state and the popular masses, and the relationship between the state and the citizen. Synthetically formulated, this concept is presented in the Program of the Romanian Communist Party in the following terms:

"The party begins with the materialist-dialectical and historical concept which says that the state is a product of the division of society into antagonistic classes that will gradually disappear as the classes disappear, as society is homogenized and as the unified working people of the communist society are created. We have in mind that during the period of building a multilaterally developed socialist society and advancing towards communism the state has to fulfill an important role in the organization of all economic and social activities. At the same time, keeping in mind international conditions and the fact that there still are countries in the world with different social systems, the state has important tasks in defending revolutionary gains and the independence and sovereignty of the country. Certainly, depending upon specific conditions, during one period or another there will be greater stress on a certain facet of the state's activities, but under any circumstances its role will increase in the scientific organization of economic and social activities."[2]

On the basis of this concept, springing from a dialectical approach to the state and from the study of its synamics, we find that in the more than 3 decades since the full acquistion of power and the establishment of the people's republic the Romanian socialist state has passed through different stages, being subjected to certain profound changes. The role and functions of the state have been developed and its organization and activities have been improved, adapting to the requirements of the different stages of the development of society.

Generally, it can be said that the stages through which the Romanian socialist state has passed correspond to those experienced by our society after the victory of the socialist revolution.[3] Thus, the period of going from capitalism to socialism generally corresponds to the stage of development of the state from the proclamation of the people's republic (1947) to the triumph of socialist relations throughout the entire economy and the creation of a unified socialist economy, which on a political-juridic and legislative level was expressed by the adoption of the Constitution of victorious socialism on the basis of the principles and theses formulated by the Ninth Party Congress in 1965. There then followed a stage of consolidating the socialist gains, covering the period between the Ninth and Tenth Party Congresses. After the Tenth Party Congress (1969), we entered the current stage of creating a multilaterally developed socialist society, a stage that will cover, as is known, a period of several five year plans, while, at the same time, preparing for the future transition to the building of communism.

In referring to the evolution of the state during these stages, comrade Nicolae Ceausescu presented some substantial theoretical evaluations: "During the entire period of socialist construction the workers state played a role of the greatest importance in providing the unified leadership in all the areas of economic and social affairs. As our society moved from one historical stage to another, the state's activities were increased and improved and, along with the elimination of the exploiting classes, the political and organization facets of these activities were accentuated, creating a new and fundamentally different organizational framework compared to the one that existed during the first years of the proletariat's acquisition of power."[4]

Actually, during its evolution the Romanian socialist state has travelled down a significant path. If during the first stage the essence of state power expressed the will and the interests of the vast majority of society, since it was aimed at eliminating the exploiting classes and exploitive relations and ensuring the triumph of socialist relations throughout the entire society, currently the essence of the Romanian socialist state represents the power of a people composed entirely of new social classes and categories and friends of the workers, regardless of their nationality. The mission of the state is to develop, consolidate and improve the forces of production and socialist social relations for the purpose of creating a multilaterally developed socialist society and advancing towards communism. To this end, it will be necessary to ensure Romania's transition from the ranks of the developing nations to the ranks of the medium-developed countries by 1985, and, on the basis of achieving the guidelines for economic-social development in the 1981-1990 decade, as approved by the 12th Party Congress, to achieve generally the tasks of creating a multilaterally developed socialist society, marking an important step forward towards a communist society.

Clearly, throughout this entire period, with the state being of the socialist type, it is radically different and superior to the capitalist type of state. For the first time in the history of our country, political power belongs to those who work, being used exclusively in their interest and against their exploitation. For the first time, state power is called upon to organize, guide and direct society towards the well-being and happiness of all the people and towards new levels of civilization and culture in the interest of the entire nation and each citizen.

In carrying out the socialist revolution, the working class needs the state in order to ensure and consolidate its victory in the revolution and to achieve the socialist and communist revolutionary transformation of society. Socialism is a new, superior order that is radically different from the capitalist order. For that reason, its creation can be achieved only after overthrowing the capitalist order and after eliminating the social and national domination of the exploiting classes and their state power. Once the working class acquires political power, it is used to completely crush the economic power of the bourgeoisie and then to ensure the triumph of socialist relations in the entire economy and finally eliminate the exploitation of man by man, giving a decisive rebuff to any attempt by the overthrown classes to recapture their lost positions. The political power is also used to consolidate the workers' power on the basis of ensuring the necessary conditions for their real and effective participation in the management of all of society. Similarly, it is also used to ensure the triumph of the new, socialist culture and ideology, based on the scientific, materialist-dialectic concept about the world and society, and to ensure carrying out of the principles of the new morals and ethics and the norms of socialist social behavior throughout society.

Likewise, the socialist state is used to ensure national independence and sovereignty, to defend revolutionary gains against any acts of external aggression, with the socialist state being in the ranks of the states and social forces committed to the struggle for peace, democracy and social progress, to eliminate force and the threat of force and wars, and to create a new international economic and political order based on the new, consistently democratic principles of international law.

The development of our socialist state in the more than 3 decades since the full acquisition of power completely confirms the materialist-dialectic and historical thesis with regards to the necessity of the state in creating a socialist society and in scientifically organizing and leading society.

Beginning with the realities of the development of the Romanian socialist society in the contemporary context, comrade Nicolae Ceausescu has formulated theses of special theoretical and practical value with regards to the dynamics of the essence, role and functions of the state, its relationship with the other social-political institutions of our society and its position within the framework of the political system, as well as in reference to the purpose and perspectives for the development of the state in the future.

In analyzing the evolution of the Romanian socialist state, comrade Nicolae Ceausescu has emphasized, first of all, the necessity of dialectically dealing with this process, keeping in mind the situation that the state does not remain immutable after the acquisition of power, but is transformed as changes take place in the economic-social structure of society and in its ideology.

The emphasis on this characteristics has special importance since it points out the perspectives for the development of the socialist state and the transformations that take place in its essence on the basis of broadening the social base of political power. Actually, if during the period of going from capitalism to socialism socialist state power was based on the will and interests of the vast majority of society, being directed, however, against the exploiting minority that was thrown out of power, after the victory of socialism and the disappearance from society of the exploiting classes and class antagonism the social basis of power was represented by the fraternal alliance and friendship of the working class, the cooperativized peasants, the intelligentsia and the other social categories regardless of nationality, which themselves were radically transformed, taking on new, socialist characteristics. As is mentioned in the Report presented at the 12th Party Congress, "Our society is composed of friendly social classes and categories actively participating in the production of material and spiritual goods. Among them there is a continuing closeness with regards to working conditions, technical-professional horizons, general culture and the manner of material and spiritual life."[5]

We have in mind, therefore, the transformations that are taking place in the social structure of the country, in the physionomy of the classes and the relationships between them and in the direction of strengthening the alliance of the working class and the peasantry and the unity of all the people and of ever more powerfully affirming the cohesion of our socialist nation.

These changes, which will be accentuate as the building of the multilaterally developed socialist society progresses, generate an aver greater degree of closeness between the social classes and categories, bringing about the strengthening of the unity and cohesion of all the people and the process of social homogenization that has begun in our society.

At the same time, our nation, as shown by the unit of will and interests of all its members, is fully affirmed as a socialist, free, independent and sovereign nation. On the basis of the just solution of the nationality problem, an enduring brotherly unity has been achieved for all workers regardless of their nationality, with the coinhabitating nationalities equally actively participating in the building of a new society.

The leading role in the state is played by the working class, the most advanced class of our society. The fulfillment of such a role clearly does not confer any type of privilege to the working class, but, on the contrary, gives it special responsibilities towards all the people in ensuring the rapid and consistent advancement of the country towards multilaterally developed socialism and communism. At the basis of this power is the alliance between the working class and the peasantry and the unity of all the social classes and categories regardless of nationality.

From the point of view of historical type, state power in our country has a socialist nature. Considered from a social point of view, it has the characteristics of a true people's power since it effectively belongs to all the people. At the same time, we can characterize it as a workers and workers-peasants power since the working class has a leading role and the worker-peasant alliance is at the base of this power. From a national point of view, a characteristic of state power lies in the fact that it belongs to a socialist nation unified with the coinhabitating nationalities, having definitively resolved the nationality problem on the basis of achieving full equality for all citizens regardless of their nationality.

On the international affairs level, state power is characterized by full sovereignty and independence and by solidarity with the social forces that struggle against imperialism, colonialism and neocolonialism, and for peace and social progress.

The Romanian socialist state is thus the political organization of the people's power led by the working class and working to achieve a multilaterally developed socialist society and advance the country towards communism. It represents the sovereign right of the people to be free and masters of their own destiny, to adopt fundamental, immediate and future decisions and to establish its future in full cognizance of its cause.

Certainly, the state is not the only political organization called upon to serve the working class in the construction of the new order. It is a distinct element having its own functions within the political system composed of the Romanian Communist Party, numerous mass and public social-political organizations contained in the Socialist Democracy and Unity Front, and the forms of self-management through which the workers directly participate in the adoption of fundamental decisions on the development of the country and in the management of social-economic units and all of society.

The Romanian Communist Party has the leading role in the political system of our country. As the leading political force for all society and the vital center of our nation, the party is the political organization that unites the most advanced sons of the working class, the peasantry, the intelligentsia and the workers regardless of their nationality. Guided by the scientific, materialist-dialectic and historical ideology, the party, as the central coordinator in all the areas of economic and social affairs, decides together with all the people upon the program for creating the new, socialist and communist society and upon the guidelines for the development of the economy, science and technology, culture and the country's domestic and foreign policies during each stage.

The leading role of the party, one recognized by all the people, involves its special responsibilities towards the people and the nation and is achieved not by placing it above society or outside of society, but by placing it within the social, state and economic organisms through the organic integration of communists in economic and social affairs and through their direct participation in work groups in solving the problems of socialist construction and uniting the general efforts of the workers. The Constitution notes the role of the party as the leading political force in the state and in society, in this manner sanctioning a fundamental principle of our political system. As a governing party, the Romanian Communist Party has the decisive, leading role in forming and adopting laws and other state acts and in elaborating domestic and foreign policies.

The most concentrated expression of the party's policy for creating a new order is given in the party's Program, the basic ideological, theoretical and political Charter of the party that establishes in a unified manner the general strategy and tactical guidelines of the party's and state's domestic and foreign policies for a period of 20 to 25 years and the fundamental directions of the development of Romanian society on the path to socialism and communism.

Our party has formulated its own concept with reagards to the place and role of political, mass and public organizations, trade union organizations, organizations for women, cultural-scientific and artistic organizations and others within the framework of the system of socialist democracy and the system of political organization in our society. The principles for the organizationa and operation of all these organizations have been improved, adapting to the transformations that our society has experienced and the current requirements of building a new order.

Special mention is needed for the Socialist Democracy and Unity Front as the broadest permanent, democratic and revolutionary political organism that unites under the leadership of the Romanian Communist Party not only all the mass and public organizations and the coinhabitating nationalities' workers councils, but also its own organizations composed principally of workers who are not party members, thus mobilizing all the people in the carrying out of the party's and state's domestic and foreign policies.

The state, the exponent of the people's power, occupies a separate place in the system of political organization in society since it has the exclusive right to adopt obligatory decisions that take the form of laws, decrees and other normative acts, and to apply the laws, whose respect is guaranteed, against those who violate them through the coercive resources of the state apparatus. As an exponent of the people, the socialist state is also in a legal sense the holder of the property rights on the means of production and all the goods belonging to all the people that are found in state property.

Our party has made an original theoretical contribution of special importance within the framework of the political system in establishing relationships between the state, the party and the other mass and public political organizations, between the state and the masses and between the state and the citizen. This contribution has been expressed in the practical means of organizing the political system and developing and improving it in our country, especially after the Ninth Party Congress. We especially have in mind the blending of party, state and public activities, the integration of the state in society and the combining of representative democracy with direct democracy and worker self-management based on the self-administration of social-economic and national units and the dialectic nature of the application of the principle of democratic centralism, as well as the spread of the application of the principle of collective leadership and work.

The blending of the activities of the socialist state with those of the communist party and the mass and public organizations is expressed in different ways, such as the organizations of a dual nature, belonging to the party and state. There are, for example, the Supreme Council of Economic and Social Development, the Central Council of Workers' Review of Economic and Social Activities, the Council of Socialist Culture and Education and the National Council for Science and Technology, as well as other local organs corresponding to these central organs. There also is the inclusion of certain representatives of party organs and mass and public organizations in the composition of different state organisms. The blending of the activities and organization of these bodies is possible and necessary because both the party organs and the state and public organs express the will and interests of all our people and militate for the achievement of the same goal and the program of creating a multilaterally developed socialist society and advancing the country towards communism. They all militate for the carrying out of the same domestic and foreign policies, as evidenced by the means and methods specific to each one.

The thesis regarding the need to integrate the state in society begins with the profoundly popular and consistently democratic nature of our socialist state and with the fact that the power stems from the people and is called upon to be exercised by the people for its own use. Within this context, we note the important measures taken along the line of improving the exercise of state power through the elective organs, as well as for ensuring the direct participation of the citizens in the leadership of the state and society, combining representative democracy with direct democracy and implementing worker self-management.

In this regard, we can mention the measures taken to increase the role and improve the activities of the Grand National Assembly as the supreme representative organ of state power elected on the basis of a direct, secret and obligatory vote. The electoral system has been developed along the line of continuing to further the democracy of this system, ensuring, on one hand, a social composition of the organs of state power that correspond to the social and national composition of our society and according a preponderant place for the representatives of the workers who work directly in production and the working class. At the same time, the proposal of a number of candidates for an electoral district has had and has the purpose of broadening the democratic means of electing workers' representatives to these bodies.

The experience of recent years shows that the Grand National Assembly, as the supreme organ of state power and the sole law-making body, makes decisions in the most important areas of domestic and foreign policies and in the leadership of economic and social affairs, science, technology and culture. On the basis of the proposals of the party leadership and the decisions of the congresses, national conferences, Central Committee, Political Executive Committee of the Central Committee, the Grand National Assembly approves the laws of the country that are obligatory for all state, political, public and mass organs and for all citizens. There has been an increase in the role of the permanent commissions of the Grand National Assembly and the members. The permanent commissions issue opinions on all the drafts submitted for discussion in the Grand National Assembly or the Council of State and, at the same time, conduct a review of the manner in which the laws are respected in all state activities. Being not only eligible but also recallable and responsible to the electorate for all their activities, the members have a close tie with the citizens in the electoral districts, periodically present reports on their activities and the body to which they belong and militate for the achievement of social-economic projects in their electoral districts.

There has been an improve in the activities of the Council of State as the supreme organ of power having permanent activities, which, during the period between sessions of the Grand National Assembly, approves decrees having the power of law, thus ensuring the continuity of the supreme leadership of the state on the basis of oarty decisions. The Council of State is at the same time also subordinate to and controlled by the Grand National Assembly.

Of special political importance was the 1974 creation of the position of president of the Socialist Republic of Romania who, as chief of state, represents the state power domestically and in international relations. The election of the secretary general of the party to the position of president of the Republic is still further proof of the organic and indestructible unity between the party and the socialist state and the special trust that the party and all the people give to the remarkable personality of the secretary general of the party, comrade Nicolae Ceausescu, the most beloved son of the people and the most authentic exponent of the will and interests of our nation.

There has been a more precise defining of the boundaries between the activities of the supreme organs of state power and the activities of the government and the ministries as executive organs. All the activities of the government as well as the ministries and other central organs of the state administration are directed towards the implementation of the laws, decrees and decisions of the supreme organs. These central organs are headed by leadership councils composed of personnel from the ministries, as well as specialists and workers who work directly in production. As executive organs, they are called upon to take specific measures from day to day in order to implement the laws and the country's sole national economic and social development plan under the best possible conditions and to achieve the domestic and foreign policies of the Romanian socialist state.

Similarly, on a local level there has been considerable improvement in the activities of the state organs on the basis of the new administrative-territorial organization carried out at the beginning of 1968 within the framework of the counties, municipalities, cities and towns. The people's councils, as local organs of state power, are true organs for the self-management of administrative-territorial units. Having broad authority in the management of local economic and social-cultural affairs, they are called upon, together with the close cooperation of the citizens, to contribute to the harmonious development of all the counties and localities in the country.

The creation of the Congress of the People's Councils, the Legislative Chamber, the National Conference of the Presidents of the People's Councils and the county conferences of the members of the people's councils has a special significance for increasing the role of the local organs of state power and the for confirming the people's councils as organs of power and, at the same time, as organs of local self-management within the entire system for the leadership of administrative-territorial units in our country.

Clearly, in the process of furthering the democratic aspect of the organization and activities of the state organs we should mention the truly revolutionary measures taken at the December 1977 National Party Conference in the field of the activities of the organs of justice, the State Prosecutor and the Ministry of the Interior. These measures deal with attracting the masses to the process of carrying out justice and getting the workers to participate in the process of educating and reeducating those who have violated the norms of socialist law. "Only with the broad participation of the masses will we be able to ensure the continued decrease and, in the end, the elimination of all types of violations and deviations from the norms of social behavior."[6]

A special characteristic of the democratic nature of the political system is the means of the workers' direct participation in the management of social-economic, scientific, cultural and educational units and the extension and affirmation of the citizens' direct participation in the leadership of the state and society. We are talking about the measures that were taken to improve the management of socialist units, beginning with the 1967 National Party Conference, and that have been continually improved, acquiring their current form of organization on the basis of the decisions of the 1977 National Party Conference and the March 1978 Plenum of the Party Central Committee with regards to strengthening the self-management and self-administration of socialist units. In this regard, workers' general assemblies were institutionalized in the socialist units, with the assemblies headed by the president of the trade union, as well as workers councils whose president is the secretary of the party organization in the unit and executive bureaus of the workers councils whose president is the director of the enterprise. We find here a new means of combining the activities of the state, party and public organs and the achievement of the direct participation of the workers in the socialist units in the adoption of plans, in the analysis of the manner of fulfilling these plans and, in other words, in the management of the units. Thus, we actually achieve worker self-management in the units, whose content has been improved on the basis of the self-administration and self-financing of the units, as sanctioned and codified on the basis of the party decisions in 1978 regarding the introduction of the new economic-financial mechanism.

And, the forms of the citizens' direct participation and the system of self-management have been developed and improved through the creation of certain bodies of self-management and certain democratic fora at the national level. In this regard, we can mention the Congress of Workers in Industry, Construction and Transportation, which is convened once every 5 years (the first was held in 1977), the National Council of Workers as the permanent organ of the Congress, the Congress on Agriculture, which, similarly, is convened once every 5 years (the first was also held in 1977), and the National Council of Agriculture as the permanent organ of this Congress.

In the field of cultural-ideological activities, we can note the Congress on Political Education and Socialist Culture, convened for the first time in 1976. In 1978, the Congress on Education and Learning was institutionalized for the purpose of discussing the principal problems in the development of this essential sector of activity; it was convened for the first time in 1980.

Similarly, we should also mention the systematic organization of numerous conferences and working meetings at the central level, by branch of activity and at the local level to analyze and resolve the most important problems in the development of society. The practice of having public discussions on the most important draft laws prior to their approval by the Grand National Assembly is also one of the means of the citizens' direct participation in the adoption of decisions at the highest state level.

The authority of the different fora of socialist democracy and the manner in which they are staffed are once again proof of the blending of party, state and public activities and the stress that our party places on the development and furthering of direct democracy and on the citizens' direct participation in the leadership of the state and society. It should be mentioned that these organisms of self-management, both in the socialist units and in the national fora, are organically integrated in the system of society's political organization, giving these organisms certain characeristics that are specific to our country. They effectively contribute to the achievement of workers' power without speaking, however, of transforming them into state organs and without nationalizing them. Beginning with the fact that socialism is built by the people for the people, comrade Nicolae Ceausescu stressed once again at the 12th Party Congress the need for all state organs to base their entire activity on the broad participation of and consultation with the masses and on the broad use of the masses' initiatives, experiences and creative abilities. He also stressed that the organisms of socialist democracy must effectively operate as fora for the responsible discussion and just and effective solution of all problems.[7]

Thus, in analyzing the place of the state in the system of our society's political organization during the current stage, we find that in our party's concept the state, as an instrument of political power, has its own well-defined role within the system of leadership of society and its activities are organically combined with the activities of the other parts of the system of political organizations. Carrying out its activities under the political leadership of the party, the activities of the state are combined and organically blended with the activities of the public organizations and with citizens' direct and immediate participation in political and social-economic affairs.

The organization of the state is achieved on the basis of certain well-defined and outlined principles which the party places at the foundation of the structure and operation of state organs and the entire state apparatus.

These principles, which are not rigid, but rather improvable, have an interconditioning and complementary relationship. Such principles are: democratic centralism, collective leadership, personal responsibility, the principle of the masses' participation in management and of carrying out economic-financial self-management and self-administration, the principle of the supremacy of the organs of state power and of the subordination of the executive organs to them, the principle of socialist legalities and the principle of socialist ethics and equity, humanism and social justice as expressions of satisfying the general and personal interests of the workers.

Similarly, we can mention the measures that were taken for the continued rationalization of the state organs' organization and methods of operation through a more just definition of their size, the simplification of their organization and operation, the reduction of the state apparatus, the growth of the portion of the apparatus directly involved in production and the reduction of the administrative apparatus, ensuring an increased level of competence and effectiveness in resolving problems.

Thus, in our country a system was created for organizing the state and, more generally, for the political organization of a broadly democratic society. It is a system adapted to the conditions of the current stage of development of the country with its own structural and functional characteristics through which a democratic and scientific leadership is achieved on the basis of the masses' active and direct participation in the discussion and adoption of decisions.

Noting this finding, comrade Nicolae Ceausescu emphasizes: "We could say that we have an organizational framework - both at the level of the economic-social units, cities and towns and at the national level - that is unique in its type and which ensures the direct participation of all the categories of workers, regardless of their nationality, in the management of the economy, social affairs and all of society. What is decisive now is the operation of these organism under proper conditions so that the elaboration and implementation of the state's domestic and foreign policies can be the result of the collective thinking and will of the workers and all our people. It is essential to ensure the proper operation of this democratic framework and the full use of the possibilities that it offers."[8]

According to the Romanian Communist Party's concept, the role of the state is ever more actively affirmed in the construction of the new order, with its functions being continuously adapted to the tasks of each stage of development in society. "Within the framework of the general activities for the scientific organization and leadership of society there has been a continuous strengthening of our socialist state and its functions have been improved in accordance with current requirements," notes the report to the 12th Party Congress.[9]

By the functions of the socialist state we mean the fundamental directions of the activities of the state, the overall grouping of its organs and its entire mechanism as directed towards the achievement of the program of building socialism and communism. As is generally accepted by political science and socialist laws the functions of the state in this concept are not to be confused with the specific activities of the state in one field or another, for example, in the field of planning, education, introducing technical progress, training personnel, foreign trade and so forth, nor with the tasks of the different categories of state organs - legislative, administrative, carrying out justice and so forth. In order to denote these distinctions, some authors use the term "funadamental functions" for the so-called functions of the state and non-fundamental functions for the specific activities of the state and its organs. Without denying some utility for this division, especially in a didactic sense, we nonetheless believe that its acceptance will generate some confusion, especially with regards to defining the content of the different categories of functions. For this reason, we have used the concept of the functions of the state only in one sense, that of the fundamental directions of its activities.

The functions of the socialist state are determined by its essence as an instrument of political power in society and by its role in the different stages of socialist construction.

As will be seen, the functions of the socialist state have their own dynamics and their scope, content and weight change throughout the different stages of the evolution of the state. Certainly, as has been stressed a number of times in our party's documents, the general, objective trend is to increase and ever more powerfully affirm those functions that deal with the organization and management of economic-social affairs and the development of the complex and multilateral process of building the new order. Under the conditions where the power belongs to the workers, led by the working class and its communist party, the state is called upon to ensure the organization and management of all of society through its own means in accordance with the party's directives and program for building a new order. For that reason, we felt it was necessary to separate into a distinct function this activity of the state, a function identified by the organization and management of society, which, in a way, is an integrating summary of all of the functions. We clearly take into account the role and place of the state in the system of political organization and the fact that the Romanian Communist Party is the leading political force in the entire society. For that reason, the statal organization and management of society is achieved within the framework of the general mechanism for the operation of the socialist political system, on the basis of the fundamental principle of the leading political role of the party. Under the guidance and leadership of the party, the state ensures the organization and management of all of society in accordance with the general interests of socialist and communist construction by using its own means and, first of all, its right to elaborate obligatory decisions and norms having the power of law for all of society.

We must keep in mind, similarly, that this leadership is not achieved by circumstances or by a restricted group of "elected" people or by an elite. On the contrary, it is appropriate for the socialist state to ensure a democratic and scientific leadership as brought about by the participation of certain ever broader masses in political affairs and by the understanding of the laws of the development of society and the newest advances of the contemporary scientific and technical revolution. It is necessary to continually work for the improvement of these essential characteristics of the state's activities. "Beginning with the consideration that both in a multilaterally developed socialist society and, at a still-far-off time, in communism, the state will have an important role in the unified management of economic and social affairs. It is necessary," points of comrade Nicolae Ceausescu, "for us to permanently work for the improvement of the state's activities and the entire system of organizing society, placing special stress on ensuring the scientific, democratic leadership of the vast effort to build the new order."[10]

The socialist state has an important role not only in eliminating the vestiges of the capitalist relations based on exploitation, but also in creating the new socialist relations and the new economy based on the socialist ownership of the principle means of production, as well as in ensuring the creation and development of the technical-material base of socialism and continually improving the new production relations. This brings about the permanent growth of the economic role of the socialist state, the amplification of its activities to organize and manage the economy and the diversification of the economy. That is why the economic function of the socialist state has special weight and experiences a permanent development and amplification for the purpose of ensuring the complete victory of communism.

We felt that the separation of this function of the socialist state into one distinct area was opportune and based on scientific criteria, beginning with the ever greater importance that our party and state give to the problems of improving the quality of life, permanently increasing the workers' material and spiritual standard of living and raising the level of civilization and culture of all the people. We must basically keep in mind the fact that man himself stands at the center of the party's and socialist state's policies along with the concern for the free and complete affirmation of his creative abilities and his personality is of special importance for the concerns of the state to have a quality of life that is of a new quality based on the principles of a socialist society and the norms of socialist ethics and equity. We should also mention the state's concerns for demographic development, the strengthening of the family and the protection of the environment.

An important function of the socialist state, one present right from the establishment of socialist power and which has experienced and is experiencing a strong development, is the cultural-educational and ideological function. This function encompasses in its sphere of activities the complex activity of the state for the socialist education of the masses, the continual raising of their level of knowledge and culture on the basis of developments in education, science, art and culture, and the permanent education and continual improvement of professional training during this tumultuous period of development in science and technology. It attests to the state's involvement in the process of carrying out cultural revolution, pursuing the placement of the entire concept about the people's world on the basis of dialectic and historical materialism and the scientific concepts about the world and life. The activities of the state organs and its institutions are especially complex. It involves, on one hand, the struggle against retrograde, idealistic and mystical concepts in society and, on the other hand, the creation of a new awareness based on the principles of a materialist-dialectic scientific concept, socialist ethics and equity and the triumph of socialist ideology. The content of this function is even more rich and varied and experiences a continuing improvement and adaption to the new requirements of life.

It is clear that in the first stage of its existence, during the first years after the acquisition of complete power, the socialist state was called upon to carry out a function of crushing the resistance of the overthrown exploiting classes, to which end the appropriate means and methods for the conditions in our country were used.

In the end, this led to the annihilation of the attempts of the exploiting elements thrown out of power to reacquire their positions and block the carrying out of the revolutionary process and the achievement of the objectives of socialist construction.

This function ceased to exist with the elimination of the exploiting classes and at the moment when there were no longer social categories hostile to the people's power, creating the social-political and moral-ideological unity of all the people in accordance with the new structure of society, with the state becoming an instrument of the power of our entire society. Certainly, this did not mean the disappearance from our society of all acts against the socialist order, rights, laws and the norms of socialist ethics and equity. Unfortunately, there continued to be individuals who did not follow the socialist principles of organization and life and infringed upon socialist or private property, socialist rights and the freedom, dignity and even the lives of the people. For that reason, the socialist state continues to exercise a distinct funtion of defending socialist gains and combatting antisocial phenomena. This function is achieved both through efforts to persuade people, seeking first of all to prevent illegal behavior, and, when it is necessary, through repressive means employed by the organs of justice, the state prosecutor and the Ministry of the Interior, pursuing, in the final analysis, the reeducation and return to society of those found guilty of violating the laws. The achievement of this function is carried out on the basis of a close cooperation between the state organs, the masses of citizens and the workers collectives. The direction for the development of this function was given by the December 1977 National Party Conference and the 12th Party Congress and involves attracting the masses, public opinion and the work collectives to the struggle against violations of the laws and the norms of socialist ethics and equity in the process of reeducating those who have committed illegal acts and those punished by law.

These are the internal functions of the socialist state, which, as can be seen, involve the entire sphere of social activity from leadership activities in general to those of managing economic-social and cultural-educational activities and to the activities for guiding the workers' behavior in accordance with the laws and norms of socialist ethics and equity and for combatting acts that violate these norms. The achievement of these functions takes place not through a juxtapositioning of the activities of the different state organs, but through their interaction and interconditioning. Even if certain organs of the state are called upon to carry out first of all and principally a certain function, they also contribute more or less, to a greater or lesser degree, to the achievement of other functions of the state. For that reason, we emphasize the complementary nature of the functions of the state and the blending and interaction of the activities of the state organs in the achievement of these functions.

Keeping in mind the fact that the state is a part of the political system of our society, a system which also involves, as we have seen, the party as a leading political force, the mass and public organizations, the activities of the workers collectives and the citizens in the process of managing society, we can and must mention that the achievement of the state's functions is carried out with the participation of the entire system of political organizations in society. They are carried out under the leadership of the party with the active support of the mass and public organizations and with the direct participation of the masses. Without such an understandind we cannot have a real picture of the manner in which the state's functions and all state activities are carried out.

Within the framework of external functions, keeping in mind the party's policy which begins with the need for our state to actively participate in the international division of labor and to intensify its collaboration and cooperation with other countries and all peoples, an important position is held by the function of developing relations of collaboration and cooperation with other states and for the promotion of a new international order. As a socialist country, Romania places in the center of its international relations collaboration and cooperation with all the socialist countries, to which it is tied by the commonality of its social-political order and by the goals which it pursues, of ensuring the triumph of socialism and communism, peace and progress. At the same time, our state develops relations for collaboration and cooperation with the developing nations and the non-alined nations. Since it is also a developing nation, it is even more natural for Romania to give special importance to its relations with these countries in their struggle to finally eliminate the gaps existing today in the world by ensuring its economic-social progress.

On the basis of the principles of peaceful coexistence our state also develops relations with the developed capitalist countries and all the states of the world regardless of their social order, actively participating in the international division of labor and the world trade of goods. Keeping in mind the objective needs of contemporary social development, our state actively militates for the creation of a new international economic and political order and for the triumph of new democratic principles that will govern international relations.

Beginning with the realities of the contemporary world, where the danger of war has not been eliminated and where there are still numerous hotbeds of war, aggressive imperialist policies and an unprecedented accumulation of arms, it is necessary for the states and peoples to wage a consistent struggle for the defense of international peace and security and for the final elimination of wars and violent means of resolving conflicts and misunderstandings between states. For that reason, a distinct external function of our socialist state is the struggle that it consistently wages for the defense and promotion of international peace and security.

At the same time, keeping in mind the international context within which the building of the new order is taking place, where the danger of certain new wars has not been eliminated, as well as the responsibility for defending the revolutionary gains, our state also carries out the function of defending the country, with the purpose of ensuring the defense of national sovereignty and independence and the participation of the Romanian socialist state in international affairs as a sovereign and independent state.

In evaluating the external functions of the state, we must keep in mind the remarkable achievements made by our country, especially after the Ninth Party Congress, as a result of carrying out an active, principled foreign policy full of initiatives under the direct guidance of comrade Nicolae Ceausescu. As a result, socialist Romania has acquired a well-deserved prestige in international affairs and makes a significant contribution in a spirit of high principles to the cause of freedom and independence, security and the collaboration of peoples, and to the struggle for the solution of the major problems confronting contemporary mankind and the cause of detente and progress on our planet.

The external functions of the socialist state, in dialectical unity with the internal ones, have as a defining characetistic the promotion of the new in international affairs. The principal directions towards which these functions converge are the elimination of the old world policies and order based on force, inequality and domination, which generated countless wars, and on forms of oppression and dependency and domination and subordination, and the creation of certain new interstatal relations that will ensure peace and collaboration between all nations on the basis of the free and independent development of each people.

The working class's acquisition of power first in one state and later in a number of countries in Europe, Asia and Latin America makes the promotion of the new in international politics a component of the external functions of the socialist state. As a result of the profound national and social revolutionary changes that are taking place in the contemporary world, objective conditions are being created for the affirmation of the new in international affairs through the appearance of other progressive social forces and through the decisive role of the popular masses everywhere in determining the course of contemporary mankind's development. These forces are militating for a new, democratic international policy, for the independent affirmation of all the nations of the world, detente and peace, and against imperialist, colonialist and neocolonialist policies of force and diktat and spheres of influence and domination.

In dealing with the external functions of the state we must keep in mind both their interdependency with internal ones and the participation of all the social organisms, the mass and public organizations under the leadership of the communist party, in the achievement of these functions. The unity of content of all the functions of the socialist state - internal and external - is expressed in the finality of all state activities, as outlined in the Constitution: "Its purpose is the development of the order and prosperity of the socialist nation, the continued growth of the people's material and cultural well-being, the assurance of freedom and dignity for man and the multilateral affirmation of the human personality."

The analysis of the functions of the Romanian socialist state and the evolution of the state demonstrates the permanent growth of the role of the state in organizing and leading society, a valid process for the period of creating a multilaterally developed socialism and in the future for ensuring the transition to communism.

The need for the role of the state to grow and to be amplified during the current stage and in the future is an essential thesis of our party and it has in mind not an increase in its administrative role, but in its constructive, creative activities for scientific organization and leadership.

The detailed analysis of the manner of carrying out each of the state's functions will give us the opportunity to ascertain the scope of the state's activities within the entire system of political organization in society, the powerful furthering and broadening of socialist democracy as a law of developing the socialist state and worker self-management, the ever more powerul integration of the socialist state in society, the interaction of the activities of the state, the party and the public, and the ever broader participation of masses and each citizen in the management of the socialist units, the state and all of society.

Here, we are referring only to dividing into periods the evolution of the Romanian state after the proclamation of the people's republic and the full acquistion of power, a moment when we can speak of a socialist type of state. The previous period, and especially the one between 6 March 1945 and 30 December 1947, represents a phase of transition where the state power had a series of characteristics corresponding to that revolutionary stage, without being able to characterize it as a socialist power. The state of this period, representing a revolutionary-democratic power having a pronounced worker-peasant nature, ensured the transition to socialist type state in our country.

ROLE OF TRADE UNIONS IN IMPROVING MINING OPERATIONS

Bucharest MUNCA DE PARTID in Romanian Oct 81 pp 41-43

/Article by Petru Furdui, chairman of the Committee of the Union of Trade Unions in the Mining, Petroleum, Geology and Electric Power Enterprises: "With the Face Always Turned Toward the Mining Initiatives"/

/Text/ In carrying on the socialist competition organized by the trade unions, under the leadership of the party bodies and organizations, for fulfilling the plan targets and the pledges made, the working people are uncovering and utilizing new resources of production, are helping to improve the processes and methods of work, to affirm the new, being aware that this is to their benefit and that of our whole society. Many of the creative ideas--technical, organizational and ethical--that they bring and put into practice to continually raise the efficiency of the production activity and to increase national wealth demonstrate, once again, the disposedness of the miners and the other workers to do, on their own initiative, more than is required of them by the plan figures, to resolve prime requirements that involve mainly the development of ore or coal production, known under the generic name of initiatives in production. The more than 20 initiatives and advanced methods of work that are now being applied, for instance, in the mining units alone, by nearly 100,000 working people are a graphic expression of their determination to utilize as well as possible the entire technical and human potential that they possess. At the same time, they constitute strong arguments for an optimistic frame of mind that characterizes the miners and the technical personnel, the researchers and the designers in this basic branch of the economy, for whom a wide field for asserting their inventiveness, talent and diligence has been opened up through the program drawn up by the party leadership with regard to providing the country's energy independence in this decade.

The existence of such a multitude of initiatives and advanced methods in work laid before the committee of the union of our trade unions and its executive bureau the not-at-all easy task of knowing them all, measuring their value and acting speedily to generalize, on the scale of the whole branch, the most efficient ones from a production and economic viewpoint. So it is that, as early as 1979, we assumed a bigger role in conducting the process of discovery, selection, expansion and generalization of the initiatives, thus giving an organized character to this new concern, in which we have gained some methodical experience, which, as the Resolution of the Congress of the UGSR /General Union of Romanian Trade Unions/ asks of us, we are now trying to develop, to utilize to the full by means of our own actions.

I would like to mention that knowledge of the new initiatives and methods that appear is a major aspect of our concern thus far, which, naturally, we are continuing by means of all the actions put in our programs. To this end, together with the competent bodies within the ministry and in collaboration with the territorial bodies of the trade unions, we periodically review, according to zones of the country, everything new that appears as a specifically mining initiative or method and their practical efficiency, pursuing especially the ones that involve the growth of physical output and the reduction of standardized consumptions of supplies. We do not schedule such analyses specially, independently, but as a separate chapter within the quarterly examination of the progress of the socialist competition. The latest investigations of this kind were done at the Valea Jiului and Oltenia mining combines and the Deva and Baia Mare ore centrals. Within them we proceeded to inventory all the initiatives appearing in the respective basins, regardless of their value, then selecting, according to the criterion of the economic effect and of the capacity to mobilize the masses, the ones that may be worth the effort to be promptly generalized in all the specialized units of the branch, on the basis of a concrete program.

Due to the concern for identifying the best out of the multitude of initiatives and methods and due to the concerted effort made by our union, the affiliated trade unions and the personnel in the ministry, supported strongly by the local party bodies, in the mining branch such initiatives as the following are being applied in the coalfields in Valea Jiului and Oltenia: "The Brigade of High Productivity and Socialist Education"; "With Each Excavator in the Quarry, a Bigger Volume of Mining Mass!"; "100 Linear Meters of Advance on the Average per Month in the Opening and Preparatory Work"; "Let Us Achieve Advances of 150 Linear Meters in the Work in Coal and of 120 Linear Meters in That in Rock on the Brigades Equipped with Cutter-Loaders!"; and "Worker Guidance." The initiative "The Brigade of Socialist Education and Labor" is giving good results in the units within the Baia Mare Mining Central, with the top formations being honored with the "Diamond of Maramures" trophy, there being success in creating among them a strong competition in work. Besides these initiatives specific to the mining sector, some of a more general economic order are also being applied, such as: "The Savings Account of the Trade-Union Group"; "Let Us Work 1 Day per Month with Fuel Saved!"; "The Friend of the New Employed in Work"; and "Each Engineer and Technician Should Solve a Technical Problem Outside His Own Tasks!".

The detection of everything that is new in the matter of initiatives and methods is only part of our general concern, perhaps its easiest aspect. Because--why not say it--while in the majority of the mines we find understanding and prompt steps are taken to create all the conditions needed for applying the good methods or initiatives, in others we must perform explanatory work to convince even the technical and administrative leaders, who say that, anyway, they have enough on their minds.

Consequently, in the fieldwork of the members of the committee of the union of trade unions we have also introduced, as a mandatory component, the task of helping the trade-union committees and the working people's councils to apply and generalize the initiatives, to keep track of the effect and to improve them. The action undertaken not long ago by us together with the Gorj County Trade-Union Council is, I believe, indicative of the way in which we proceed in order to expand and generalize the initiatives. At the Rosia Pesteana Mining Enterprise, for example, we had studied the disciplinary situation of the personnel and, finding many infractions, we considered it advisable to, among other measures, also give the working people's council and the trade union there concrete help in increasing the role of the foremen in production, by establishing the objectives of the initiative "Worker Guidance" in relation to the specific character of the respective unit.

First, through the activist of the union and that of the county trade-union council who are responsible for this unit, we acted to experimentally apply this initiative, for the first time in the Pesteana Quarry, and then, for 6 months, we followed it day by day in order to see its practical efficiency. Notices and folders were printed up and posters that illustrate the initiative's content, the directions and the requirements that it involves were made up to support its application. In addition, conferences and discussions between brigades and the trade-union active and the foremen in the quarries were organized in order to share basic experience gained. The working people's council there was convinced to exhibit greater interest in this initiative, to collaborate closely with the trade-union committee on organizing the matter of knowing and distinguishing the results according to work formations or the time when it is necessary to give help in solving the problems posed by the introduction of the initiative. As a result, the unexcused absences were reduced considerably, since the intransigence of the foremen and the opinion of the staff, through the trade-union groups, acted coordinately and with severity, an occurrence that had as a result a 9-percent rise in the index of use of equipment and excavators.

On the basis of these good results and the experience accumulated, we decided to act to extend this initiative to the whole mining basin of Oltenia, for which purpose we organized a conference with a character of an exchange of experience at the Rovinari Mining Enterprise, in which the trade-union-group organizers, top workers, brigade members and foremen, chairmen of the trade-union committees and management personnel of the sectors and in the quarries participated. The content and the way in which the initiative was being applied, the results obtained and the lessons that must be taken into account were presented on this occasion. Beginning with this year, "Worker Guidance" was undertaken in all the mining units in Oltenia, with some mining sectors in Valea Jiului and Baia Mare also entering into its area of spread, it now being applied by about 12,000 working people, according to our records.

Working in this way to implement the instructions given by Comrade Nicolae Ceausescu at the UCSR Congress, we ensured that a number of initiatives would take on a mass character. The initiative "The Brigade of High Productivity and Socialist Education" was generalized in all the units in the basin of Valea Jiului, at Motru and Baia Mare, containing in its sphere a total of over 2,000 miners, and at the Lupeni Mining Enterprise, the initiative "The Brigade of High Productivity and Socialist Education" is being applied by 50 brigades and 8 mining sectors and led to the achievement of over 40,000 tons of coal above the plan for the first half of this year, with the whole pledge for 1981 thus being overfulfilled. In addition, in this period, significant quantities of coal above the plan were extracted at the Barbateni, Paroseni, Uricani and Vulcan mining enterprises and at the Cimpu lui Neag Quarry.

From our own experience, however, we have become convinced that we must also devote just as much attention to maintaining at a higher and higher level the interest in undertaking and applying the initiatives and to involving with concrete responsibilities, besides the trade unions, the technical, engineering and management personnel in the mining units, in the combines and even in the ministry. Because, in many units, these personnel, although they appreciate the contribution of the workers' initiatives to mobilizing the staffs to attain the priority objectives of production (and the efficiency obtained is graphic), are nevertheless not involved decisively enough to contribute to the creation of the technical-material conditions that would permit the undertaking and implantation of these initiatives.

This is precisely why the practice--now a permanent feature--of organizing in each quarter, together with the managements of the mining combines, in the basins of Valea Jiului and Oltenia, conferences with technical personnel in the management of these big production units, heads of mining sectors, foremen, brigade members, trade-union-group organizers and trade-union chairmen has found a place for itself in our style and methods of work. On this occasion, the results obtained in applying the advanced methods or initiatives and the concrete contribution made by those present are analyzed separately and measures for the future activity are established for each enterprise. Being aware of the decisive contribution that the initiatives have to effectively increasing the spirit of competition in work, and of the fact that the concerns of the trade unions in this regard must be intensely stimulated, we also introduced, by mutual agreement with the management of the ministry, two special occasions as part of the conferences: 1. The recognizing of the trade unions that have concerned themselves more closely and methodically with utilizing the initiatives, whose experience we present then and there; and 2. The awarding of bonuses, from the funds of 0.05 percent of the combines and 1 percent of the enterprises, to the best work formations, which, applying the described initiatives, have found salutary solutions for extracting more coal or ore, for obtaining a higher output on each work front. New pledges for expanding some initiatives are made on this occasion.

Frankly, what does not please us, out of all that we have done in this field, is the fact that a very valuable initiative like the one that has inscribed on the credit line the motto "Not one car of coal rejected because of rock that can be separated at the workplace!" is applied by a small number of brigades and, unfortunately, it has been abandoned at some units in Valea Jiului. And this is when the working people's councils and the trade unions in the mining units in Valea Jiului, in pursuit of quantity, are neglecting the quality of the output. To give ourselves an idea of the importance of the initiative, it is sufficient to state that over 40 million lei in penalties for deviations from the quality prescribed for the coal furnished were paid to the electric-power enterprises in the first half of this year.

It goes without saying that a number of actions devoted to spreading and generalizing these initiatives are contained in our programs, with us being concerned with helping methodically, on the spot, particularly those trade unions and collective bodies that, although they participated in our conferences and exchanges of experience, have not acted with the due seriousness to promote the valuable initiatives, exhibiting laziness, formalism or superficiality regarding such an element for stimulating the production activity that could bring them great benefits.

We are sure that, by expanding our own actions devoted to rapidly discovering the new initiatives and by selecting the most valuable ones for application, expansion or generalization--constant concerns, to which we will add those pointed out in the last part of these lines--we will help the affiliated trade unions to the utmost to utilize the new disposedness of the miners also generated by these initiatives, thus all contributing to the providing of the primary energy resources that would support the program for economic and social development of the homeland drawn up by the 12th party congress, to the attainment of the stage of a country with an average level of development by Romania in this 5-year period.

JURISDICTIONAL DISPUTE BETWEEN CROATIAN COURTS

Zagreb VJESNIK in Serbo-Croatian 28 Nov 81 SEDAM DANA pp 14-15

[Article by Maja Miles]

[Text] Courts, of course, do not dispute with one another every day (we use the term "dispute" only provisionally and quite loosely, since it is not a question of any legal dispute, but of a dispute of views and opinions). That is why what is happening (and has been happening for several months) between the Supreme Court of Croatia and the Administrative Court of Croatia is a true little curiosity, with all the accompanying spices and preconditions for it to become a very rare plant: an authentic juridical scandal, and, if not, at least a very hot topic for the courthouse corridors. At present the story is just circulating about how two very high (to put it mildly) republic courts have gotten into an argument, an argument about which of them is higher, which outranks the other and which is subordinate on what occasions and for what subject matter, and indeed which on this very subject is the more professionally and legally competent? So that we do not create pictures and conclusions from the nightmare of reports we have been furnished by the well-informed, by the less-well-informed and by the altogether uninformed--we set off to inform ourselves about the mysterious events on the spot.

The spot is No 3 Zrinjevac, a building housing both of the parties to this unusual quarrel. The events consist of a correspondence which at the moment is made up of three "pieces"; two of the administrative court and one of the supreme court. And that is all, except the total of 38 pages of rather dense printed text containing material for at least two or three conferences, topics for lawyers to win very subtle points and so many open questions that we can only say: whoever has the task of finding the ultimate agreement is to be pitied.

In any case, the task here for a newsman is not to be envied in the least: to provide what we refer to as an objective report, since when you read it page by page and piece by piece in just 1 hour, each of them at least several times in nearly complete persuasion, only to be at once dissuaded by the next one and persuaded of the exact opposite. Nor is it any wonder, if we remember that this is not a dispute whose participants are just anybody, but who are two very high authorities in the legal and constitutional system; such as these usually know what they are talking about.

Except that this time one is saying one thing, the other something else, and they are equally convincing.

Which Has Jurisdiction Over What?

To be brief. Everything began with a proposal of the Constitutional Court of Croatia that certain things be amended in the Law on the Regular Courts (the republic law which was passed in 1977 and which supposedly was already in need of being amended, on the basis of the traditional short life of our laws), and in particular that the status of the administrative court be changed so that it would finally become what--in its opinion--it should be and for what it was originally established (once again in 1977): the highest court in the republic for administrative disputes. Yet to achieve this, the Supreme Court of Croatia, which today has rather broad opportunities to "outrank" the administrative court, has to be deprived of certain of its powers, or those powers have at least to be limited: some have to be altogether passed on to the administrative court, while others would be shared with the administrative court. But we will not enter into all the cases which in the opinion of the administrative court should be redistributed, but only those which are most important. For example: when the so-called extraordinary legal remedy of petition for protection of legality (which is declared by the public prosecutor if he deems that the court has violated some republic law) is allowed against rulings of the administrative court, the supreme court ought no longer to make the decision, or at least not alone. That is, it is absurd, the administrative court asserts, for the Supreme Court of Croatia--which is otherwise not concerned at all with administrative matters except in those (extremely rare) cases of protection of legality, to be able to set aside decisions of a republic court (the administrative court) which is specialized in disputes of precisely that kind, and it is still more absurd for it to do so in what is referred to as a small panel--consisting of only three judges. Three judges, that is, who spend the entire year working on altogether different cases, now all of a sudden quash verdicts which are the expression of long years of practice, of great experience, and that everyday experience with the very specific attribute of dealing with highly entangled subjects such as expropriation and nationalization proceedings, tax, construction, housing and administrative accounting disputes, old-age and disability pensions, and so on.

It would be more logical, professional and consistent for the new law to provide that the judges of the supreme court rule on petitions for protection of legality jointly with judges of the administrative court--in a joint common session. As a matter of fact, that in fact was the case before 1977, when the administrative court was not even any separate court, but only a division of the supreme court, and when decisions on petitions for protection of legality against its rulings were made in joint sessions. How is it that it is different now when, to paraphrase the problem as stated by the administrative court, it is an independent court, and that the highest court in its domain? Yet the method of ruling on appeals is actually "lower"?

It sounds logical. But that is not yet all: that same joint session, the administrative court proposes, ought to be envisaged in all cases when the supreme court is adopting its so-called legal views on matters of principle in the various fields of administrative law. The opinion of the supreme court on matters of principle have great influence on practice, and it would be logical for the administrative court, that is, its judges, who best know administrative subject matter (by contrast with the judges of the supreme court, who encounter it only sporadically) to be given the chance, when necessary, to have its say (not only to have its say, but also to vote). And not only that: the law should also provide for the administrative court itself to have its own "common and joint session" in which it would set forth its own opinions on matters of principle: after all (and this is a paradox which especially troubles the administrative court), the opinions on matters of principle which are now set forth solely by the Supreme Court of Croatia do not affect the practice of administrative officers and agencies, since they are not bound by them, just as (legally) the lower courts are not bound by those opinions either (in criminal, civil and other cases). Thus their strength does not go beyond mere authority; by contrast the legal views of the administrative court which are binding in individual decisions upon administrative officers and agencies (this is a specific feature of the administrative dispute) would have a formidable direct impact on "those down below."

Lengthy and Sharp Response

Otherwise--that is, if neither of these proposals goes through, there is hardly any point at all, the administrative court asserts, in having a supposedly separate and supposedly republic court for administrative cases; it would be best for it to be returned to the bosom of the supreme court from which it came. For it to be reduced again to a "division"--and then it would as such actually have more influence on the practice of the highest court in the republic than it does the way it is now. Second phase: the supreme court responds to the proposals of the administrative court, and that rather extensively and rather sharply. None of the changes being proposed comes under consideration: first, because some of them cannot be regulated by republic law at all (the one about courts), since they fall under federal jurisdiction, and the others could not be implemented "even if they were otherwise acceptable," because this would violate nothing more or less than the republic constitution.

In other words, there is perhaps the basis for the administrative court's objection to the number of judges on the panel of the supreme court which has the power to rule on certain of its decisions. But the makeup of a judicial panel is a part of adjective law and a provision of the federal constitution explicitly places this in the competence of the federal legislature (in other words: in this case one needs to wait not for amendment of the Law on Regular Courts, but amendment of the Law on the Administrative Dispute). An explicit federal provision places judicial proceedings in the competence of the Federation (except for so-called special proceedings, but the administrative dispute does not come under that head), and that is a very important provision whose purpose is to ensure the equal position of citizens before courts throughout Yugoslavia.

On the other hand the Constitution of SR [Socialist Republic] Croatia has given the Supreme Court of Croatia--and not a single other "high" court--the power to set forth views on methods of principle and legal conceptions, and that not without reason and gratuitously, but in order to ensure uniform application of laws by the (regular) courts throughout the republic; for the same reason it has been given the power, the exclusive power, to rule on extraordinary legal remedies such as the petition for protection of legality which so much bothers the administrative court. Thus the constitution has reserved this for it, the supreme court, and it alone, and that all the way to one domain in which now the administrative court would like to participate. Sharing those powers with the administrative court would--we are freely interpreting the positions of the supreme court--actually mean a trampling of the constitution and turning things topsy-turvy. The mere fact that the administrative court is a specialized court which best knows the field in which it works does not at all support the view that it should take over the power of the supreme court in those fields, but precisely the opposite: the more specialized the courts, the greater the need for a joint and supreme arbiter to be above them, an arbiter which would equalize their practice in the application of (frequently the same) laws, in order to prevent one and the same legal system (and often the same laws) from being differently interpreted from area to area. That is why the constitution has designated one and only one supreme court for all the branches of the (regular) courts, and that is why the administrative court can neither be absolutely supreme even in an administrative dispute, a court above which there would be none higher.

For the same or similar reasons it cannot participate in sessions of the supreme court either, not even when views are being adopted within its own field of administrative law: incidentally, this would be as if district courts claim such rights only because the matter involves the cases they otherwise try and the like. Likewise, only the judges elected to the supreme court can rule on a petition for protection of legality with the full right to vote, and it would be absurd for those meetings to be attended by the judges whose decisions are being deliberated (except possibly as advisers, without the right to vote).

Nor does it come under consideration that the administrative court again become a division of the supreme court, since in the first place there are no real reasons for that, nor could that step backward be taken at this moment: when our jurisprudence is organized altogether differently than it was before 1977. For that matter, who asserts that the administrative court should not have become precisely what it is? No one--except the administrative court!

It Is Difficult To Judge the Courts

This is a description, certainly only in the briefest outline, of more than 16 typed pages of the very astutely developed line of argument (our job here, let us not forget, is truly an unenviable one). Here again we can make the observation: it really sounds convincing, but now comes a new "item"--"Review of the Opinion of the Supreme Court," offered by the administrative courts, and the arguments (counterarguments) are again quite convincing, to put it mildly (conclusion: when lawyers, lawyers moreover of high caliber, endeavor to convince you of something, there is no hope for you, and this time there were lawyers like that on both sides).

First of all, asserts the Administrative Court of Croatia, it just is not altogether true that only and exclusively the Federation can prescribe the makeup of a court, and that here the republics and provinces would not be able to do anything at all in their own laws. The makeup of a court, to be sure, according to the generally accepted interpretation, by and large falls in the area of procedural guarantees, and is therefore a part of adjective law, which truly is in federal jurisdiction. But, the administrative court asserts, this does not mean that the federal legislator himself cannot leave a portion of the issues of adjective law to the republics, which is precisely what he has done in the Law on the Administrative Dispute, since he has prescribed that the decision in an administrative dispute shall be made by a panel of three judges "unless law specifies that the decision on some action taken against decision rendered in an administrative dispute be decided by a larger panel of judges." The "law," then, and not "federal law"--which accordingly could be a republic law.

And as for violation of the supreme position of the supreme court in the judicial hierarchy, were it to open the doors of its meetings to administrative judges, it should not be forgotten that this would be nothing new. Indeed this inviolable position claimed by the Supreme Court of Croatia is not defended by any other supreme court in the other republics or provinces. In Slovenia the supreme court and the special court of associated labor (which has jurisdiction over a portion of the cases tried in our republic by the administrative court) have a "joint session" in which they jointly adopt views on matters of legal principle, and no one there raises the question of whether this has violated the exclusive right of the supreme court to guarantee uniform application of laws in the republic; in Serbia the higher economic court (they have no administrative court, which outside of Croatia has been instituted only by Bosnia-Hercegovina) participates similarly in the proceedings of the supreme court; and not only that--the Higher Economic Court of Serbia participates even when the supreme court is deciding on extraordinary legal remedies against ... its own verdicts and the verdicts of economic courts in Serbia. In Bosnia-Hercegovina on the other hand, the only republic where there is a separate administrative court like ours, the institution has been introduced of the expanded joint session of the supreme court in which the panel includes judges of the administrative court and in which legal conceptions are adopted--exactly the arrangement which our administrative court would like to see, but our supreme court is refusing.

And so on, and so on. And these are only the main, or at least most interesting "points of dispute." Now the supreme court will probably respond to the new arguments, perhaps dissuade all those whom the administrative court has just managed to convince, or again convince those whom the administrative court has dissuaded. But that is the way when courts "quarrel" (and again this is said very provisorally): it is difficult to act as their judge.

ORGANIZATION, FUNCTION OF WARSAW PACT DESCRIBED

Budapest NEPHADSEREG in Hungarian No 48, 28 Nov 81 p 11

[Article: "Structure of the Warsaw Pact Organization"]

[Text] Sergeant-Major Kalman Pongracz wrote to our editorial office inquiring about the structure of the leading bodies and organs of the Warsaw Pact Organization and about the role of the Committee of Defense Ministers. Since his question is of interest to many of our readers we are replying with the following.

The basic document for the defense organization of European socialist countries was signed on 14 May 1955 in Warsaw. As is well known, the alliance was created to counter the aggressive North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which was established in 1949. Its basic task is to secure peace in Europe; to develop, on the basis of the principles of internationalism, fraternal friendship, cooperation and mutual assistance among the member states, and a reliable collective for the defense of socialist achievements.

The highest organ of our defense community is the PTT (Political Consultative Commission). In general, it meets annually or as necessary, and it has the right of decision in the most important political and military political questions. The first secretaries (secretaries-general) of the communist parties of the member states and the workers' parties, the heads of state, and on occasion the foreign and defense (national defense) ministers participate in its work.

The highest level military organ of the Warsaw Pact Organization is the HMB (Committee of Defense Ministers). The committee was formally established by a March 1969 resolution of the PTT, but in practice the ministers, in bilateral or multilateral form, had also been consulting prior to that time. The HMB meets periodically in various capital cities, and the defense ministers of the member states serve by turns as chairman. The main task of the committee is continuously to follow internal and international events affecting the activities of the organization, exchange experiences gained in the development of the armed forces in the member states, closely coordinate joint activities, and work out proposals serving effective combined defense.

The positions, recommendations and proposals of the HMB are standard in the work of the joint upper leadership organs as they are in the activities of the national military leadership. Decisions are passed by majority vote, but are binding only on those who join in the yes vote. The earlier consultations of the ministers used to be primarily mutual information forums, but now the committee plays an incomparably greater role in all aspects of the development of military integration. Within the Warsaw Pact Organization the United Armed Forces Command operates as a permanent organ. At the top is the Chief Commander (at present V. Kulikov, marshal of the USSR). The Command is responsible for the practical execution of joint military tasks, oversees the training of the United Armed Forces, the preparation and conduct of joint exercises. The governments of the member countries appoint chief commander deputies from among their own armies. The Hungarian deputy chief commander is General Karoly Csemi, state secretary in the ministry of defense.

The chairman of the EFE (United Armed Forces) Military Council is the chief commander and its members the chief commander deputies. The Military Council has essentially consultative and proposal-making functions. Among other things, it investigates such problems, for example, as the maintenance of the combat readiness and mobilization capability of the United Armed Forces at the constantly desired level, the organizational build-up of the troops, the organization of their training, the long-term plans for quality development, the improvement of troop leadership, the measures for preparing the theaters of operation, and so forth.

The direct operational superior organ of the chief commander is the staff of the United Armed Forces. The chief of staff (at present Army General A. Gribkov), as first deputy of the chief commander, coordinates the activities of the leading organs of the United Armed Forces command.

DANGERS OF OPPORTUNISM, SECTARIANISM STRESSED

Tirana BASHKIMI in Albanian 7 Dec 81 pp 2-3

[Article by Sevo Tarifa, deputy director of the Institute for Marxist-Leninist Studies in the Central Committee of the Albanian Workers Party: "The Class Struggle Is Carried out Properly When Opportunist or Sectarian Deviations Are not Tolerated"]

[Text] In his report to the 8th Congress of the Albanian Workers Party Comrade Enver Hoxha stressed: "To properly carry out the class struggle means to carry it out without tolerating deviations of the right or of the left, opportunistic or sectarian deviations." This teaching has a great theoretical and practical significance.

Opportunism of the Right--The Main Danger

In the body of the proletariat and of its party, opportunism is like a knife with two cutting edges: right and left. The right cutting edge is rightist opportunism, revisionism, which has been and remains the main enemy of our party and of the entire international Marxist-Leninist Communist movement.

One of the outstanding characteristics of our party is its intolerance toward the class enemies and its determined and principled struggle against them. In its 40-year existence it has encountered and vanquished foreign enemies, various imperialists and Titoite, Khrushchevite, Chinese and Eurocommunist revisionists and, from the very beginning, opportunists and factionalists such as Anastas Lulo, Sadik Premte and other enemies who appeared, from time to time, out of its own ranks. In this framework, our party is ready to carry on a bitter class struggle against deviations of the right. This struggle is expressed in two directions: against the opportunistic views and hostile activity of betrayers of the party and against opportunistic manifestations of our people who have been educated and tempered in the class-revolutionary spirit.

Rightist opportunism is the main danger. The causes are varied. Some of the internal causes include: the pressure on the party exerted by remnants of the classes which have been overthrown, which operate not only directly against the dictatorship of the proletariat, although the latter is vigilant and active, but also indirectly, secretly working to prevent the building of socialism in the country; the pressure of old vestiges which exist in the awareness of individuals, who are "invisible enemies", "they do not have teeth but their bite is fatal"; the pressure of new hostile elements who, from time to time, come out of our ranks, who gradually take anti-socialist positions and become dangerous to society; the petit-bourgeois origin of many communists which leads some of them to falter and to tolerate the class enemy; the inadequate ideological training of a number of communists which often makes them confuse antagonistic and nonantagonistic contradictions, underestimate the class enemy, relax their vigilance, and slip into positions of rightist opportunism.

The espousal of rightist opportunism is also explained by external causes. The following are the main external causes: imperialist-revisionist political pressures against our country, which are many and varied and have the aim of bringing the Albanian Workers Party to its knees, stifling the only revolutionary voice in Europe, and removing Albania from the path of socialism; the ideological aggression of the capitalist-revisionist world, which, in regard to our country, is widespread and fierce, and which aims at denigrating its socialist reality and debasing our opinions; the economic blockade and the economic and financial crises of the capitalist-revisionist world which also have dangerous results for Albania; the military threats of foreign enemies which aim at frightening our people who do not get frightened, at arousing the phychoses of war, insecurity, pacifism, opportunism and capitulation.

These internal and external manifestations, which make rightist opportunism the main enemy and danger, have an objective nature because they exist independent of our will, awareness and desire. But this does not mean that they are inevitable; it does not mean that the subjective factor, the party, cannot do anything against them. On the contrary, a true Marxist-Leninist party, such as our party, which follows a correct line and struggle to prevent evil, takes action to prevent the birth of revisionism so that the tragedy of the Soviet Union and some other countries, where the revisionists and counterrevolutionaries have come to power, will never occur.

In addition to the struggle which our party has been consistently carrying on against the enemies of Marxism-Leninism, the revolution and socialism, it has carried on and is carrying on an unceasing and fierce struggle against liberalism and bureaucracy, which are grist for the mill of counterrevolution, which are two dangerous enemies and which threaten the dictatorship of the proletariat from within, and, therefore, a determined struggle against them is vital for the fate of socialism.

Sectarianism--Leftist Opportunism

Life shows that the line of our party has never been opportunistic or sectarian. It has always been engaged in a struggle between the two extremes. Some manifestations of opportunism, and of sectarianism, are the result of errors of specific individuals and are a consequence of distortion in the practice of the correct line of the party.

What are the causes of sectarianism and what are some of its bad consequences?

The opportunist makes the enemy his friend while the sectarian goes to the other extreme and makes his friend the enemy and goes so far as to call a party person an enemy. The opportunist does good things for every child of the enemies while the sectarian does bad things to all these children. The two of them do not differentiate. The opportunist indicates that he is ready to admit any element into the Front, even a person who has been condemned for hostile activity while the sectarian does not approve of the admission to this organization of any person even one who could be a member.

However, it is not only persons who make concessions to the enemy who are guilty of opportunism. Persons who make concessions to a comrade or friend whose faults they see but do not criticize also fall into opportunism. The opportunist is meek when he should be harsh. The sectarian is always ready to say that everything should be resolved by administrative measures while the opportunist pardons you when you should not be pardoned. In this case, sentimentality nurtures opportunism. A person who is an opportunist today with a comrade or a friend runs the risk of being an opportunist tomorrow with an enemy. Small mistakes which are not corrected turn into big mistakes.

What are the general reasons why some people fall into sectarianism? They are: narrow and rigid viewpoints which hinder the broad and correct judgment of issues; the arrogance of those who think that they are all-powerful, that they have unlimited rights and can do what they want, even though it conflicts with regulations; the wavering of individuals of petit-bourgeois origin who, when they are criticized for rightist opportunism, go over to the other side, to leftist opportunism.

Sectarianism is damaging. It makes people dissatisfied; it dulls them intellectually; it irritates them; it immobilizes them in their work. When people are not treated tactfully they become dissatisfied. In this way, the sectarian errors of this or that communist or cadre damage the ties of the party with the masses and their unity. Manifestations of sectarianism hinder the activation of cadres and activists because the sectarian is confined to a narrow circle of male comrades and even fewer female comrades, in whom he has little trust. Sectarian concepts hinder the augmenting of the ranks of the party, the rise of new cadres to positions of responsibility, the underestimation of old cadres, the discovery of new forms and methods for the organization of the work, education and mobilization of people.

A Struggle on Two Fronts

The present-day revisionists accuse us of being sectarians because they want us to be opportunists like they are. But we are neither opportunists nor sectarians because both are dangerous. Rightist opportunism leads to revisionism. It is the real main enemy but this does not mean that sectarianism does not present any danger. Sectarianism is the other cutting edge of opportunism, rightist opportunism. Therefore, as the 8th Congress of the AWP said, opportunistic or sectarian deviations "are equally dangerous and have serious consequences for the party, for the unity of the people and for socialist society". In the final analysis, the most dangerous thing is the one which is not combatted. In an organization or collective which struggles only against opportunism but not against sectarianism, the latter can be more dangerous. In a place where only sectarianism is combatted, opportunism thrives and, in this case, it is more dangerous. This means that the disease which is not combatted spreads. Therefore, good work is done when neither one nor the other are forgotten.

Sectarianism is the brother of opportunism. He who is a leftist today is preparing to be a rightist tomorrow. A leftist action today runs the risk of becoming an opportunist action tomorrow. A balance can be achieved only by correctly implementing the party line, properly noting manifestations of sectarianism as well as opportunism.

The secret of the struggle against opportunism and sectarianism lies in the fact that they must not be combatted only when they raise their heads. A continuing preventive work must be carried on so that evils are exposed before opportunistic and sectarian manifestations appear. This requires, at all times, political clear-thinking, ideological maturity, revolutionary sharpness, class education, a militant spirit, sincerity toward the people and a deep hatred of the class enemy. But, our correct and determined attitude in regard to enemies should not lead to sectarianism. As the party teaches us, opportunism is not combatted from positions of sectarianism. The Marxist-Leninist theory of our party is properly put into practice when the fire is not extinguished against one or against the other, because as Comrade Enver Hoxha stressed at the 8th party congress: "Only by carrying out the class struggle correctly and without deviations, with the broad participation of the working masses led by the party will the present always be built correctly and will it rest on sound bases and will the future of the fatherland and of socialism be assured."

RELATIONS WITH WESTERN EUROPE, UNITED STATES, CANADA ASSESSED

Sofia MEZHDUNARODNI OTNOSHENIYA in Bulgarian No 4, 1981 pp 42-47

[Article by Lenko Lenkov: "Relations of Bulgarian People's Republic with Western European Capitalist Countries, the United States and Canada at the Beginning of the 1980's"]

[Text] The Bulgarian People's Republic has met the 1980's with increased international prestige acquired because of the principled basis of our foreign policy--the strengthening of peace and opposition to warmongering aggressive forces, peaceful joint collaboration as equals between states with a different social order.

Consistently conducted on all lines, our country's foreign policy guarantees the sovereign and independent development of present-day Bulgaria on the path towards the further all-round progress of a developed socialist society. This conclusion was affirmed from the rostrum of the Twelfth Congress of the Bulgarian Communist Party. The congress reported the successful fulfillment of the foreign policy goals set by the Eleventh Congress and, first and foremost, of the most important goal--the intensification of the alliance with the USSR and other fraternal socialist countries and active promotion of the strengthening of the unity and solidarity of the socialist community. The congress of Bulgarian communists made a thorough class analysis of the international situation and found that despite the open opposition of the enemies of detente collaboration between states with a different social order is developing satisfactorily on the European continent: political contacts at all levels have become more intensive and fruitful of results; the volume and scope of economic, scientific, technical and cultural relations have grown. Thanks to the omnifaceted and energetic activity of the Soviet Union and the entire socialist community detente has continued and international security has been fortified despite significant artificial deterioration of the international situation because of actions of the most aggressive circles of imperialism, and especially the United States. The course of confrontation, accompanied by saber-rattling and unconcealed military preparations, shows that the danger of a new war has not been definitively eliminated.

In this situation the Twenty-Sixth CPSU Congress updated the peace program, thus giving the peace-loving forces exceptionally favorable opportunities for reenforcement of the peace offensive. The Soviet Union's important foreign policy initiatives in the most urgent world-troubling areas show how the reactionary course of confrontation can be thwarted and new impetus given to detente under conditions of the 1980's.

The Bulgarian Communist Party, viewing these conditions and preconditions creatively and from the standpoint of the scientific approach, has projected the country's new foreign policy course and the lines of its further development, aimed at clearly and realistically attainable goals in the struggle for a widening of political and military detente and for progress of the people and peace-loving humanity. Adapted to the development of present events in the world, the foreign policy course of the Bulgarian People's Republic, affirmed from the rostrum of the congress, is a constructive continuation of the Blagoev-Dimitrov policy and a new creative application of the party's April foreign policy line. This consistency in our foreign policy is, in final analysis, our contribution to the normalization of the international situation, to the creation of an equilibrium of forces in the world such that imperialism cannot dictate the fundamental lines of development. That is why the fundamental tasks now facing our foreign policy continue to be active and constructive cooperation in guaranteeing lasting peace and creating the most favorable foreign policy conditions for the building of socialism and communism in our country and the other fraternal countries, and further affirmation of the principles of peaceful coexistence. For Bulgarian communists and for our entire people the equal and mutually advantageous collaboration of states with a different social order is the only sensible way to eliminate the danger of a new world war.

The Western European countries, the United States and Canada occupy an important place in Bulgaria's system of political, economic and cultural relations with the developed capitalist states. Our foreign policy towards these countries is directed towards a persistent and consistent surmounting of the natural and artificial barriers in the path to detente under the conditions of the political climate created since the Conference on Security and Cooperation. The real and positive effect of high-level contacts and meetings has created conditions and preconditions for a widening of bilateral relations. Our presence in these countries is becoming more and more active and fruitful of results at the beginning of the present decade. Comrade T. Zhivkov's recent meetings with leaders of the FRG, Portugal and Malta, with the king of Belgium, the chancellor of Austria, with the ministers of foreign affairs of Finland and Spain have been of prime importance for the positive development of Bulgaria's relations with the developed capitalist countries. To be noted especially is Comrade T. Zhivkov's exceptional contribution to a full, successful and constructive scientific exposition of the principles, goals and problems of Bulgaria's foreign policy during national and international events--speeches to the National Council of the Fatherland Front, the 80th anniversary of the BZNS [Bulgarian National Agrarian Union], the World Parliament of Nations for Peace, and at the ceremonial session on the occasion of the 1300th anniversary of the founding of the Bulgarian state. As a whole, the energetic foreign policy activity of the country's party and government leader has given a new invigorating impetus to, and raised to a higher level, the development of relations with the aforementioned countries.

Very useful also have been Comrade P. Mladenov's meetings with his colleagues from Austria, Spain, Finland, France, Iceland, Denmark, the FRG etc., at which new demarches for the widening of collaboration with these countries were frankly and logically outlined. It is to be noted that at the present moment a number of meetings of the Bulgarian minister of foreign affairs with ministers of the aforementioned states have been prepared or are in the process of preparation, thus eloqnently attesting to the broad scope of the country's foreign political contacts and indisputably confirming Comrade T. Zhivkov's statement that "in no other period of our history did we maintain so diverse and mutually advantageous contacts with the developed capitalist countries."

From the beginning of 1980 to the present moment the number of our ministers who have visited Western European countries, the United States and Canada, and of their counterparts who have visited our country, exceeds 40. The mutually advantageous and beneficial contacts along this line have been primarily in the promising areas of economic relations, culture, tourism etc.

The exchange of parliamentary delegations is continually expanding. An ever larger number of prominent political, economic and cultural figures from Western countries visit Bulgaria and show lively interest in our peaceful foreign policy, our economic potentialities and rich cultural heritage.

A token of our active peace-loving foreign policy and of our country's increased potentialities and prestige is the national and international forums and meetings that have been held in Bulgaria: the celebration of the 80th anniversary of the founding of the Bulgarian National Agrarian Union, the International Detente Dialogue Meeting, the World Parliament of Nations for Peace, the Third International Meeting of Writers, the meeting of ministers of education of European countries, the meeting of ministers of culture, the "Banner of Peace" International Children's Assembly and many others. They have furthered the mutual acquaintance of the participants and the exchange of ideas and have doubtless contributed to the cause of world peace.

A recognized and useful form of political exchange with the capitalist countries is regular consultations between ministries of foreign affairs. These contribute substantially to the clarification of many problems and stimulate the development of bilateral relations. In our relations with some countries these consultations are at present the most recognized and acceptable form of official exchange.

Exchanges with the capitalist countries by way of political parties, social, trade-union, youth, sports and other organizations also have a definite place in the conduct of our foreign policy. The results in this area are encouraging and concretely attest to the political prestige of our country, which more and more is winning recognition as a sought-after, desired and esteemed partner.

An important trend in our country's activity in broadening economic, scientific and technical relations with other states is the rational utilization of the potentialities of the international division of labor. Naturally, the center of our attention has been and continues to be collaboration with the countries of the socialist community. But at the same time our country desires the establishment of stable and mutually advantageous economic relations with the developed capitalist countries and the broadening thereof subject to strict observance of mutual obligations. The constructive principled approach of our party and government to economic collaboration with these countries confirms the peace-loving character of our foreign policy in international economic relations as well. On the other hand, the rapid development of the present-day material and technical base has become a precondition for the continuous qualitative improvement and activation of Bulgaria's foreign economic relations, including those with the Western European countries, the United States and Canada. The program of the Twelfth BCP Congress has created an objective foundation for new dynamic prospects in our foreign economic relations.

At the beginning of the new decade our commerce with the countries of Western Europe, the United States and Canada exceeds 2.6 billion foreign-exchange leva. The structure of our exports to these countries, which valuewise exceed imports, is constantly improving. A wide basis in treaty law for the development of economic exchange with a large part of the European capitalist countries has been constructed and is being improved. New forms are coming into practice: industrial cooperation, the setting up of mixed enterprises, of projects in third countries etc. etc.

Our country firmly stands by its policy directed towards the overcoming of discriminatory restrictions and the improvement of the commercial and political conditions of our economic relations with the capitalist market. At the same time the United States still holds back from granting us the most-favored-nation clause for overtly political reasons. The adoption of a politically realistic position by the U.S. Congress and the granting of the clause without advance conditions would create the preconditions for the expansion of Bulgarian-American economic relations and for their normal development on a mutually advantageous and equal basis. Nor do we meet with an adequate expression of political good will on the part of the European Economic Community. Displaying patience, constructiveness and initiative, our country, as a participant in the Council for Economic Mutual Assistance, calls for the materialization of tangibly created conditions for vigorous and mutually advantageous economic collaboration between CEMA and EEC and between the countries of these communities.

The overcoming of discriminatory barriers, the growth of balanced trade, the rise in the efficiency of our exports, and the further development of new forms of economic exchange are the basic directions to be taken for the development of Bulgaria's foreign economic relations in the years ahead, which, seen against the results already achieved, conclusively attests to the correct and successful foreign economic policy towards the Western countries.

Our international relations in the area of cultural collaboration are constructed on the principle of peaceful coexistence, too. Our socialist culture makes its contribution to the struggle for peace and detente, for social progress and the spiritual flowering of humanity. The preconditions for this are the thousand-year history of our country, an artistic potential tremendous in its scale, and the high achievements of our present-day culture and art. Since the signing of the Final Act at Helsinki the Bulgarian international cultural policy has increasingly been more closely linked with our consistent peace policy and subordinated to the long-term and immediate goals of the Bulgarian state in the international arena. The Twelfth BCP Congress assigned to cultural policy the tasks of popularizing the progress of real socialism and the rich history of the Bulgarian people, of promoting the better acquaintance of people, of strengthening the confidence between countries, and of being an important means of mobilization in the struggle for peace.

Bulgarian socialist culture and art continue indisputably to win international recognition. The "Thracian Art," "Bulgarian Medieval Civilization" and other exhibitions in Austria, Sweden, Switzerland, France etc. have had tremendous success. The practice of organizing Bulgarian film, music and theater weeks has been gaining ground and a more comprehensive picture of Bulgarian culture is thus formed in the individual countries. Representatives of the Bulgarian People's Republic take an active part in international cultural events organized by the Western countries and win prestigious prizes. Creative contacts are being actively developed between writers, critics, theater lovers etc. Our country is world famous as the initiator and organizer of international competitions, festivals, meetings etc., for welcoming exhibitions, theatrical casts, troupes of artists etc., and for opening wide its doors to real and genuine values created by human genius and to cultural collaboration on behalf of peace and progress.

The celebration of the 1300th anniversary of the Bulgarian state opened up new, still greater and more lasting opportunities for carrying on large-scale comprehensive activities and for the mutual exchange of cultural values with these countries. In prospect is the realization of unique ideas, programs and events, which will have a long-term effect and be an original contribution to international cultural collaboration.

One of the fundamental tasks of our foreign policy that is taking on increasingly greater significance and timeliness is the fashioning of a broad basis in treaty law for bilateral relations with the developed capitalist countries of Western Europe, the United States and Canada. Agreements in various areas outline the directions and prospects for long-term stable development of relations with these countries on principles of peaceful coexistence. They have as their aim that the most favorable foreign political and foreign economic conditions and preconditions should be secured for building a developed socialist society in our country. At the beginning of 1981 the Bulgarian People's Republic had over 150 agreements, entered into and in effect, with these countries. The number of draft agreements presented or in process of consideration and coordination is large. Experience shows that the work involved in building, expanding and updating the treaty basis of Bulgaria's relations with the developed capitalist countries is complex. The difficulties stem primarily from the fact that, owing to their political, economic and narrowly class interests, our partners exhibit restraint and reserve. All the treaties, agreements, protocols and other official documents signed between the Bulgarian People's Republic and individual Western countries are the fruit of our country's initiative and persistent work.

An important element in our foreign policy as well is the strengthening of security and collaboration in Europe and the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act. An eager participant from the very beginning of the process, the Bulgarian People's Republic is actively approaching the preparation and conduct of the Madrid meeting. Our country is for the formulation of a balanced final document of the meeting as regards all sections of the Final Act. The Madrid meeeting would make an especially valuable contribution if the difficulties and unconstructive position of certain Western countries were overcome and a decision taken to convene an all-European conference for military detente and disarmament.

Combining a creatively multilateral diplomacy and a bilateral approach, the Bulgarian People's Republic continues to improve qualitatively the geographic thrust of our foreign policy. Our relations with the Federal Republic of Germany are now growing and expanding. A common desire exists to seize the opportunities for a dynamic, long-term and lasting collaboration.

Our relations with France and Italy are developing well. The basis for this is the growing objective opportunities and the mutual interests of our nations. The development of our relations with these countries, however, still lags behind the real opportunities.

Bilateral Bulgarian-Austrian relations encompass almost all areas. Their upward trend is welcomed by both sides. The frank, constructive and useful dialogue, held recently by the chairman of the State Council, Comrade Todor Zhivkov, with Austrian chancellor, Dr Bruno Kreisky, not only regarding bilateral economic and other questions but also regarding urgent international problems, is a good example of relations between two states with a different social order.

There is also progress and good prospects in the development of our economic, political and cultural relations with Holland, Belgium, Spain and Switzerland. Our collaboration with Finland, Denmark, Sweden, Norway and Iceland is also developing well.

A certain expansion of economic, scientific, technical and cultural relations with the United States, Great Britain and Canada has been achieved. Our country has repeatedly expressed its readiness to create a solid foundation and political relations with these countries.

The forecasts say that the 1980's will not be easy. The most important task facing mankind is the protection of peace, equal collaboration and mutual respect. The surest and most effective way of solving the burning and urgent problems of present-day international life is not military force, but constructive dialogue and negotiations. The Bulgarian People's Republic is fully resolved to make its contribution to the achievement of real results in peaceful coexistence and the protection of peace.

PARTY WEEKLY DISCUSSES DEVIATION FROM DEMOCRATIC CENTRALISM

Belgrade KOMUNIST in Serbo-Croatian 30 Oct 81 pp 9,10

[Article by Zivorad Djordjevic: "The Principle Is Clear--the Deviation Is in Application"]

[Text] Democratic centralism is again becoming the center of discussions in the League of Communists. This is not just a question of the usual pre-congress discussion about one of the themes from party life. It could rather be asserted that the main reason for this discussion was deviation from this principle in the practice of the League of Communists, and inconsistent application of it. All of us, more or less, want a united LCY, and we also want democratic centralism, but we are also striving for autarchy and independence of individual parts of the LCY (which are hard to identify with the efforts for democratization); this is seriously contradicting our above-mentioned verbal commitments. Thus the attempts in practice to disrupt the unity of the LCY and to violate on this basis the principle of democratic centralism make it necessary for a thorough discussion to take place, before the 12th LCY Congress, the republican congresses, and the provincial conferences, not about democratic centralism as a principle, but primarily about the application and observance of this principle.

In the ideological and political-normative sense, the documents and commitments of the LCY do not leave anything open to question in defining the need for democratic centralism and its essence. The LCY Statute is very clear: democratic centralism is the basic principle for the internal life, organization and activity of the LCY and all of its members, organizations, forums, and organs; this principle makes possible the united and disciplined implementation of a democratically adopted policy.

What Is Really New

Even such clear commitments, however, are more and more frequently being disputed, and attempts are being made to have something that is unambiguous covered with a veil of a suspicion of ambiguity, and, in the name of the "need to respond to the demands of the time," to change the basis for the unity of the LCY, and thus also the cohesion and stability of all of Yugoslav society.

Some authors are raising the following questions: what type of unity is suitable for the LCY--one based on classical democratic centralism, which imposes strong obligations, or one based on democratic agreement? There are also some theoreticians who openly reject democratic centralism, considering it an obsolete and outgrown LCY principle. They say that Lenin's party is not the same thing as the present-day LCY (which is correct), but in saying this they are forgetting that "not being the same" is not being "absolutely different"; in democratic centralism they see only a bureaucratic concept of centralism, but they do not see its significant democratic component--the participation of the membership in constructing a policy; and they therefore conclude that democratic centralism is the "immanent over-emphasized role of the leading organs." They want to be authentic Marxists who start from practice, but they behave like scholastics who cannot perceive their own time because of their excessively strong prejudices.

Many "affairs" are obviously mingled together here. We want unity, unity based on self-managing agreement; and this is in order. But we really do not want a democratic centralism that imposes obligations. This means that we will arrive at unity through democratic agreement, but what will oblige us to observe and carry out our agreements in order for us to preserve our unity? The critics of democratic centralism are left without an answer to this. Experience teaches us that because of our nonobservance of agreements, in short because of our irresponsibility, we have seriously threatened not only the unity of the LCY but also the unity of society as a whole. By rejecting the "obligatory" element in democratic centralism, we in fact are not only rejecting this principle as such, but are rather turning the LCY into a debating tribunal, with the validity of democratically adopted decisions ending with the conclusion of the debate. Thus, the obligatory discipline of the members and organizations in carrying out the policy agreed upon, as a constituent part of democratic centralism, within the complex Yugoslav community, is not transitional in nature and cannot be replaced or eliminated. Conscious discipline is also significant today, and it will be 50 years from now just as much as it was 50 years ago. This also applies to democratic centralism as a dialectical union of the democratic participation of the membership in the formation of policy and conscious discipline. It is another question that the critics of democratic centralism, at the very mention of the term "centralism," grab their pockets in order to pull out all possible spiritual and political weapons, and that they obviously do not want to realize that not every centralism is always undemocratic, as well as that not every decnetralization is always democratic. If a "centralist" decision is reached in a very democratic manner, and if such a decision preserves unity, can it be denounced as undemocratic?

The critics of democratic centralism are trying to show that "democratic agreement" and "obligatory discipline" are mutually exclusive and that the second should be replaced by the first, thus eliminating the principle of democratic centralism. However, just as violating the right and opportunity of every member to participate in creating policy would reduce the LCY to a bureaucratic organization, neglecting obligatory discipline in carrying out a democratically agreed upon policy would likewise turn it into an ordinary discussion club.

Advocating a consistent application of democratic centralism does not at all challenge or exclude the need to strengthen democracy within the LCY by full mobilization of the membership in creating policy. This really is a constituent part of democratic centralism, and this is what must be continually strengthened in the LCY, and what gives new features to democratic centralism. This innovation in democratic centralism--the democratic method of formulating party policy and decisionmaking--is entailed by democratic centralism as we have defined it. This is why the meaning of the struggle by the LCY to modernize democratic centralism, to adapt it to the needs of the time, is in expanding the actual participation of the membership in formulating party policy, in redistributing power between the leadership and the membership, and not in abolishing the principle because it entails obligatory discipline which supposedly threatens the freedom of agreement.

The Roots of Arbitrariness

The challenges to democratic centralism are least of all abstract ideological or theoretical constructions. Furthermore, the verbal challenges are marginal in contrast to arbitrariness in practice in the application of democratic centralism. Thus the roots of the challenges are precisely in the everyday life of the LCY. There are many of them, but we will mention two basic ones: a weakening of unity and cooperation, disruption of what links us, and a strengthening of what divides us; and a neglect of responsibility, in fact, an opportunistic toleration of irresponsibility. The roots are thus in practice, and the actual ideological resistance of a dogmatic-bureaucratic and anarcholiberalist nature to democratic centralism is only a spiritual manifestation of the actual relationships within the LCY and society as a whole.

The increasingly more pronounced tendencies toward regional separation into republican, provincial, and commune areas are also having a serious effect on possible appearances of autarchic behavior by individuals parts of the LCY. The intense discussions conducted during the 1970s about whether the LCY is a united organization or a federation of republican and provincial organizations did not then have purely theoretical features, but rather, in fact, were a reflection of division and danger to Yugoslav unity. This dilemma is not being openly posed today, but an attempt is being made to push through a point of view that we have outgrown the principle of democratic centralism. In fact, as in the 1970s, it expresses our division and separation by republican, provincial, and commune borders.

If the republican, provincial, or commune organizations (or to put it more precisely, their leaderships) serve primarily to achieve the national or regional interests of their areas (and unfortunately, it happens that this is not always a question of nationalism, but rather of the partial interests of the leaderships and bureaucratized groups and individuals in them), then the application of democratic centralism threatens such a distorted role for the party organizations and their leaderships. Thus if the LC, instead of struggling to achieve the interests of the working class, gives primacy to regional, partial, and autarchic interests, then it itself serves to divide and break up our unity and cooperation; and then it is pointless to speak about being consistent in the application of democratic centralism, because democratic centralism imposes an obligation of unity and consistency, while autarchy and partialization are a deviation from this.

Practical experience increasingly assures us that in spite of the economic disunity and nonfunctioning of the united Yugoslav market, more and more, under the guise of pluralism of self-managing interests, all possible territorial specific features are being glorified to the point of absurdity, while for the most part what divides us is being stressed, and what links us is being neglected. Furthermore, we are frequently witnesses of attempts to have every reference to Yugoslav cooperation and unity declared unitarianism. They are deliberately ignoring the notorious facts that togetherness and unity are not the same thing as unitarianism, but also the fact that our delegate system, and the entire self-managing socialist system and method of policy formulation in the federation, in practice make unitarianism essentially impossible as a widespread practice, not only for a single nation, but also for groups and individuals on the level of society overall. The truth is that such attempts are possible, but have no prospects of being accepted or disseminated. All of the delegate bodies and the leaderships of sociopolitical organizations in the federation are elected on an equal basis. It is obvious that such bodies, by definition, cannot conduct a unitarianist policy. All of this basically undercuts the roots of unitarianism as a mass ideological orientation. Without underestimating the danger from the frustrated ambitions of individuals and groups for indulging in unitarianism, and without denying the necessity of struggling against unitarianism as a social relationship, it should nevertheless be said that the necessary struggle of the LCY against separation and nationalism and for unity and cooperation should not always be challenged with warnings of "beware of unitarianism!"

The opportunistic toleration of irresponsibility is another great source of attempts to bypass democratic centralism. In fact, even not carrying out decisions, i.e., violations of democratic centralism, is irresponsibility. The spread of irrsponsibility in society, however, damages the fabric of the LC, like any other infection, and exerts an influence on the violation of democratic centralism. Here we are obviously mixing concepts with intentions. If we refer to the need to observe the laws--legal, political, moral, in a word, social norms--it is almost as though an alarm were raised and warnings were issued about the danger from administration and bureaucratization, and the danger to self-management, while the fact is forgotten that self-managing socialist society is an organized society, the social relationships in which, and life in which, are subordinated to social rules of behavior. legal and political norms, and that not adhering to these rules leads to the disintegration of society. On the other hand, it is forgotten that referring to responsibility is not only within the jurisdiction of the state. The socialist self-managing system is planned in just such a way as to have social control, in the broadest sense of the word, exercized by the working class organized through self-management, so that the functioning of responsibility does not mean the activity of the specter of the bureaucratic mechanism of the government.

But tolerating irresponsibility and applying democratic centralism are mutually exclusive. The application of democratic centralism in any form whatsoever does not suit an irresponsible person or someone who tolerates irresponsibility, because it would disrupt the autocracy and anarchic behavior of the first, and the opportunistic tranquility of the second. Thus, while we play with the application of democratic centralism, we will also have irresponsibility, and conversely, while we tolerate irresponsibility, democratic centralism remains in the background.

Survival Through Application [of Democratic Centralism]

As long as the cohesion of Yugoslav society must be ensured through the unity of the LCY, the application of democratic centralism remains a necessity. The need for democratic centralism originates in the LCY's responsibility to the working class and the working people. It is difficult to conceive of achieving the interests of the working class in a complex multinational community without implementation of those principles which are a condition for the normal functioning of an organized society.

We must, in fact, ask whether the Yugoslav community can exist without some guarantee that will make possible the achievement of a minimum of unity, cohesion, organization and responsibility. In other words, the question is what factor will coordinate the federal structure of Yugoslavia, which is based on the statehood of the republics, with the need for the unity of Yugoslavia, and which will democratically and authoritatively overcome these differences, at certain times of disagreement that can threaten necessary unity, and even survival. It is obvious, we will say, that this factor is the LCY and its united ideology; but we can see that in spite of the united ideology, we differ, not in ideology, but in expressing the different interests of republican, provincial, and even commune etatist structures. Thus, without the consistent application of democratic centralism, the achievement of what is in the general interest of the working class is threatened. It is worthwhile to recall Veljko Vlahovic's timely warning that "abandoning the principle of democratic centralism in the LCY would mean its breakdown into various factions guided by different interests and concepts, which originate primarily from the contradictions of socialist development. In fact, this would represent a liquidation of the League of Communists, and thus also an abandonment of socialist social development to uncontrolled natural processes."

BOSNIA-HERCEGOVINA LC DISCUSSES OPSTINA STATUS

Sarajevo OSLOBODJENJE in Serbo-Croatian 27 Nov 81 pp 3-4

[Summary of the address by Sabrija Pojskic, executive secretary of the Presidium of the LCBH Central Committee, and of the subsequent discussion: "Strong Affirmation of the Opstina as a Self-Managing Association"]

[Excerpts] After emphasizing that it is in the opstina, as the basic sociopolitical community, that the numerous needs and interests of the working people and citizens and of their self-managing organizations and communities are expressed, reconciled with one another and realized in practice, that they exercise their rights and discharge their obligations on an everyday basis, and that it is here that the work and life of the working people and citizens take their most concrete form, Sabrija Pojskic said that it clearly follows from this that achieving the constitutional position of the opstina is an extremely important and large question of political ideology. After all, the further strengthening of the position of associated labor and of the workingman within it and in society depends to a considerable degree on the consistent self-management transformation of the opstina on the foundations of the constitution, just as the self-management transformation of the opstina depends objectively on a constant strengthening of the position of associated labor.

Experience has shown, and the working group came to that conclusion in preparing this meeting, that overall relations in the opstina develop as a function of the development of the relations of socialist self-management, especially in basic organizations of associated labor and local communities and as a function of the effective operation of the institutions of the political system.

The shortcomings and sometimes lags in development of the relations of socialist self-management which have been manifested even as group-ownership behavior and practice, with a more or less pronounced narrow, partial and local interest, Pojskic said, with rather pronounced tendencies of representative decisionmaking rather than decisionmaking based on delegacy, as well as the practice of reaching agreements on the vital issues and interests within narrow groups and narrow confines, so that the decisionmaking by the working people and citizens is sometimes reduced to a formality thereby, constitute a serious obstacle to more decisive breakthroughs in building up the constitutional position of the opstina, and clearly demonstrate that the tendencies toward bureaucratic-technocratic behavior do exist.

We can say today that a sizable number of organizations of the League of Communists, primary organizations above all, as well as certain organs of the League of Communists, still have not equipped themselves adequately for effective conduct of ideological-political activity aimed at building up the opstina as a self-managing community of working people and citizens. It is a fact that certain members and primary organizations of the League of Communists have not become fully aware of the responsibility they themselves bear for resolving all the overall issues in the opstina through the process of mutual linkage and interdependence of self-managing organizations and communities. The reasons for this situation and these relations should be sought in the manifest tendencies toward confinement into "one's own" organization and self-managing community. Regardless of the motives that lead to confinement, this objectively impedes, and sometimes even prevents, the interests of the working people in the opstina, which at times are quite important, from being reconciled and jointly resolved through the decisionmaking of the workers themselves. Primary organizations of the League of Communists are not discharging one of their basic obligations in such cases, which is, together with the working people and citizens, in conformity with real capabilities and in the concrete socioeconomic conditions, to stimulate and contribute to development of those processes which ensure effective resolution of all issues of common interest to the working people and citizens and thereby of each individual interest.

Promoting the Process of Decisionmaking on the Basis of Delegacy

All the problems and difficulties are manifested most vividly in the activity of opstina assemblies, especially the shortcomings which are manifested in organizations of associated labor and local communities, whether they be a consequence of improper organization, or, much more frequently, the result of slowness in development of the socioeconomic relations of socialist self-management. It is here that we should look first for the basic reasons why more full-fledged processes of reconciliation and resolution of all the interests of the working people and citizens, of organizations of associated labor and of local communities are still not being created in opstina assemblies. Among other things, this naturally has the result that the opstina assembly manifests itself considerably more as a body of government, and incomparably less as a body of self-management in which the interests of self-managing organizations and communities are reconciled through a democratic contest of opinions and decisionmaking procedure based on delegacy. The result is that on the one hand executive and administrative organs, and indirectly, through delegates who often are not tied to the delegate base, even by the specialized staff services of organizations of associated labor, exert a large influence on decisionmaking in opstina assemblies, while on the other hand decisions concerning major social issues are made without sufficient participation of the working people and citizens in the decisionmaking process. There is a danger in this that the working people and citizens will become passive in the decisionmaking process, that is, that they will not be sufficiently involved in the overall flows of delegate decisionmaking concerning common interests.

It is obvious that institutional creation of organizations of associated labor, of local communities and of the other institutions of the political system is not in and of itself enough for the constitutional conception of the opstina to be realized effectively. Our experience already allows us on the basis of critical assessments and the experience gained to find opportunities for practical solutions which will contribute to more successful functioning of the institutions of the political system in conformity with the delegacy principle of decisionmaking. One of the things made necessary thereby is that the conditions and opportunities for advancement of the process of decisionmaking by the working people and citizens through delegates and the scope and content of opstina assembly proceedings be subjected to more detailed critical assessment and examination. Certain forms of practical behavior, however, indicate that opstina assemblies are having a fair amount of difficulty in divesting themselves of the operating procedures and subject matter which are typical of the system of representation, and the result is that the old relations and content are retained to a considerable extent within the new institutions....

It is often said in discussions of the development of the delegate system that the delegations are overburdened with material, that they are not sufficiently tied to their constituency, and so on, which is true, Pojskic went on to say. However, the priority issue concerning the functioning of the delegate system is why the delegate's constituency is still expressing its interests and needs insufficiently. When there is not the necessary initiative of the delegate base in this direction, neither the delegation nor the delegate is able to raise particular issues in delegate assemblies. The reasons for this, it seems, should be sought in the fact that the working people, because of the insufficient development of self-management relations within their basic organization of associated labor and local community, are not yet able to examine their interests and needs over the long run and to commit themselves on that basis to ascertaining their common interests and needs.

The LC's Extremely Important Role

However, it is a fact that in the practical realization of this process there is still not enough awareness of mutual interests, of differences, and of the manner of and opportunities for their reconciliation. Practice is still predominantly oriented toward self-interest and to a lesser extent toward seeking and finding solutions of common interest through discussion and agreement. It is here that we should seek the principal causes of the slower pooling of labor and capital on the basis of income sharing and the lack of success in implanting the principle of free exchange of labor. The possibility for the movement of social income in line with broader social interests is often confined for all practical purposes at the level of the opstina. LC organs and organizations in the opstina objectively contribute to this as well, not through their decisions and the stands they take, but by the fact that they do not fight vigorously enough against that practice and behavior.

The differing nature of interest is a reality that must be taken for granted. Only through the organized effort of the League of Communists and the other subjective forces within the institutions of the political system is it possible to overcome those differences and interests, and that precisely on behalf of more effective realization both of each individual interest and also of the general and common interest. It must be constantly born in mind that the shortcomings in, say, one organization of associated labor, are inevitably generating difficulties and problems to a greater or lesser degree in a number of other organizations within the opstina as a whole. That is why the need to reconcile all interests always emerges as the individual interest of each organization and community. Unfortunately, this is often forgotten in the activity of a number of organizations of the League of Communists.

Overcoming the Old Practice More Decisively

There is a need to overcome more decisively the practice whereby the activity of the primary organizations of the League of Communists is mostly exhausted by the taking of stands, while the concrete monitoring and guidance of the activity of party members in the institutions of the political system to implement them is neglected. That is why it is no accident that the activity of communists often goes no further than the organizational forms of the activity of the League of Communists, while at the same time there is a lack of broader activity in the bodies of self-management, in delegations, in sociopolitical organizations, and especially in the Socialist Alliance.

The successful effort and strengthening of the role of the opstina conference of the League of Communists are inseparable from its constant linkage with and reliance on the initiatives of the rank and file and of basic organizations of the League of Communists. Along that line it is especially important to ensure within the opstina organization of the League of Communists that the rank and file of the League of Communists, on the principles of democratic centralism, enjoy maximum participation in formulating positions, which thus will strengthen responsibility for implementing them through the institutions of the political system. Wherever the rank and file of the League of Communists are still participating little in formulating views in the opstina organization of the League of Communists, those positions are also being implemented incompletely, committees and conferences are operating in a top-heavy fashion more than is necessary, there is not enough close linkage among basic organizations of the League of Communists, committees and conferences, nor are they sufficiently open to the initiatives and opinions of the working people and citizens.

[Discussion]

Alija Latic had this to say, among other things:

"The adaptation of certain organizational arrangements within the institutions of the political system in the opstina is also a precondition for fuller exercise of the right and discharge of the obligation to conduct a broader effort based on independent initiative. Let us recall, for example, that 122 local communities have more than 5,000 inhabitants (some even more than 10,000), that approximately the same number of local communities have between 4,000 and 5,000 inhabitants, which means that in size of population more than 200 local communities are larger than the smallest opstinas in the republic, and then that a considerable number of opstinas are also rather large in both area and population, and that there are still OOUR's [basic organization of associated labor] with a large work force. It is not difficult to conclude that under such conditions it is objectively difficult for the working people and citizens to display broader and more direct initiative in the process of self-management decisionmaking and perform still more effectively the functions of the political system in the opstina."

This kind of internal organization of the opstina and of the institutions within it, in Latic's words, also objectively limits the effective effort of the League of Communists and the other organized socialist forces. In certain of the larger opstina organizations there are even more than 30,000 members of the League of Communists and as many as 750 primary organizations of the LC. This makes it more difficult for the opstina leadership to have firm everyday links with the primary organizations and to strengthen unity in political ideology and in action of the opstina organization of the LC and for members of the LC to act more fully as principals in formulating and implementing policy.

Making Executive Organs More Accountable

Participating in the debate in yesterday's meeting of the LCBH Central Committee, Milan Skoro spoke among other things about the abnormalities and oversights in opstinas as the basic sociopolitical communities, emphasizing among other things that often the working people and citizens are dissatisfied with technocratic and other behavior displayed in the bodies of government. In the communes, Skoro said, there are things which are not and cannot be accepted from the standpoint of the League of Communists as the vanguard of the working class. There are, for example, a tendency, and this, as he put it, is very dangerous to the future development of the system of communes and the broader sociopolitical communities, for the commune to represent itself as a federation of local communities. This is contrary to the nature of the commune.

"The local community," Milan Skoro said, "cannot assume the functions of a sociopolitical community. That is not its constitutional function, nor does the practice of socialist self-management make this necessary."

He advocated that in the coming period, through the organized effort of the League of Communists and all the other social structures, that there be a reassessment of certain elements of the system in order to evaluate how we are doing in developing an opstina in which the working people and citizens are to realize their most direct interests and needs. The opstinas differ greatly from one another in area, in population and in level of economic development.... Certainly this should be borne in mind during the conversations and concrete implementation of agreements among people to create urban communities.

Presidiums as Working Bodies

Raif Dizdarevic said in the discussion that the question of strengthening work and responsibility and of introducing the 1-year term of office in opstina assemblies is a very urgent one. This stands immediately in front of us. If it is the conception that we will achieve what we want through the initiative to strengthen collective work and to introduce the 1-year term of office merely by the fact that every year we will change the individuals holding the positions of the presidents of the opstina assembly and of the chambers, but without an ongoing activity on the part of the subjective factor, which will ensure the further development and strengthening of the delegate system in the commune, then there are real dangers of our not achieving this historical step in development of the political system of socialist self-management democracy which we intended and do intend to achieve by strengthening collective work and by introducing the 1-year term of office. Dizdarevic expressed the fear that we might go from one extreme to the other. At present we have had the very evident extreme that the presidents of opstina assemblies have often remained for a long time in their posts. Often the objective situation has brought that about. People did what the objective situation demanded and what it led them to do. "But I am afraid that now we might go to the other extreme, to the situation where in the course of a year of performing a function people will simply pass in transit through that office." We need to ensure, Raif Dizdarevic said, that during the next term of office, over the next 4 years, the delegate assembly develop further in the spirit of delegacy, that its role and its work become stronger, that all delegations be committed more fully, and that means that all the working people and citizens become more involved in the spirit of self-management. If we fail to organize ourselves for this and if we do not consciously keep a watch on it, we could find that the power of the executive bodies of administration and specialized staff services is dominant in the communes, and that would represent a real danger of our coming to a halt in development of the delegate system in opstinas.

One of the possible solutions, in the opinion of Raif Dizdarevic, would be to form the presidiums of opstina assemblies as working bodies rather than as organs of assemblies, and that working bodies which would be made up of delegates for a term of office coinciding with the term of office of the assembly and oriented above all toward preparing what the chambers of the assembly and the assembly as a whole needs for adoption of programs, which would be followed by its concern for implementation of the programs of the assembly as a whole, for ensuring the necessary coordination of efforts within the assembly, and then for the necessary coordination of the work of the assembly with assemblies of self-managing communities of interest. Of course, when we speak about the work of the assembly, about coordination, and so on, it is above all the assemblies and delegations we are talking about. Then their power might also extend over ensuring continuous accountability to the delegate assembly, to all delegations and to all the self-managers of all organs and holders of office elected and appointed by the delegate assembly and accountable to the delegate assembly under the constitution and law. This presidium as a working body, in the opinion of Raif Dizdarevic, would be a factor that would contribute to strengthening collective work of the delegates in assemblies as a whole and in delegations in opstinas as a whole. Certain other arrangements, he said, are also possible, but unless in supplementing the opstina charter we provide some mechanism which will guarantee this kind of development of the delegate system in the commune, with respect to the work of the opstina assembly there is a real fear and danger that the influence and power of executive organs, administrative agencies, and specialized staff services could predominate, while the work of the delegate assembly and of the delegation could die out, and that would be a long step backward.

Raif Dizdarevic spoke in particular about operating procedures in assemblies in general. There is something that exists in the republic and also exists in the opstinas--confinement of bodies solely to themselves and confinement of those who have been elected to bodies primarily to the work of those bodies, within those bodies and between bodies. There is not enough direct involvement of party members among citizens and workers in all the organs of the assembly. This should be corrected, Dizdarevic said.

What Do the Demands for New Opstinas Bring With Them?

In his speech Milanko Renovica paid particular attention to the questions of the transformation of the opstinas in a geographic sense. Since this is a very complex set of problems, a very careful approach should be taken to all initiatives for a change, but this does not mean any delay whatsoever. These initiatives must be the result of sound analytical work if the criteria or elements for shaping the opstinas are to be at all uniform.

In other words, this means that in forming the opstinas consideration should be given to all the elements so that the working people in such a community might exercise their basic constitutional rights and discharge their duties as in the basic sociopolitical communities, and so that they might realize their overall interests in a basic geographic and functionally linked socialist self-managing community.

This, as Milanko Renovica put it, necessitates verification of two parallel tendencies which differ, however, in their intensity. First, the creation of new opstinas, as a rule smaller ones, and second, for a time there has existed a rather disguised tendency, a tendency undeveloped and unaffirmed, and that is the creation of larger and stronger opstinas. This latter tendency, he said, is slacking off. Those behind it were the organs in the opstinas and those outside the opstinas. It has been almost displaced, weakened and neutralized by the policy of the uniform development of a republic whose backbone would be the opstina. The opstina is that socioeconomic framework in which the policy of socioeconomic development is to be set forth and carried out. Accordingly, what happened in practice was that those places which had been underdeveloped and which continued to be opstinas had a far greater and more intensive development than those places which had been urban or certain other agglomerations and had a certain tradition, including an industrial tradition, and where for various reasons those opstinas were abolished or merged--their economic, social and other functions were crippled, their development was crippled, and this is now encouraging the initiative to create new opstinas.

That means that this former tendency, this practice of creating new opstinas, should truly undergo a definite sociopolitical verification to see what concrete form it might take in the context of our present development.

ARGUMENT OVER 'KARDELJIZATION' OF SYSTEM REJECTED

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1610, 8 Nov 81 pp 22-23

[Reaction of Branko Vukusic to an article by M. Kesetovic published in NIN on 18 October 1981: "On the 'Kardeljization' of the System". Translation of this article is published in JPRS 79705, 22 Dec 1981, No 1951 of this series pp 60-64]

[Text] One passage in the committed and topical article on our present "moment of truth" (M. Kesetovic, NIN, No 1607, 18 October 1981) deserves particular examination. That is, in analyzing the causes of our present difficulties, certain "saviors" assert that the source of the problem lies in "Kardeljization of the system." I categorically concur in Kesetovic's view that the truth is precisely the opposite--our practice has been "de-Kardeljized" to such an extent and is so much out of line with our commitments in the constitution, system and principles we have adopted, that one would do better to look here for the principal explanation of our present situation. I also have certain specific reasons of my own for such an opinion, and I sense the need and duty to substantiate it.

In the last years of Kardelj's life I had the good fortune to work alongside this great man of our own and the world's communist movement. I had occasion to see for myself the extent to which this tireless creator was the exact opposite of certain notions about him which were circulated covertly about the man himself while he was alive and now are being circulated ever more openly about his work as well.

Those who speak about "Kardeljization" of the system in a pejorative sense certainly know quite well that "Kardeljization" is actually "Titoization." Kardelj's work is so Titoist in all its elements that it is impossible to distinguish it.

In their work, and especially in that which has not yet been published, there is so much that is topical that it is impossible to seek a way out of our current problem without constantly turning to the creativity of these inseparable great men of our revolution. The example of Kosovo best confirms this for us. Comrades Tito and Kardelj issued a timely warning about the situation we had got in. Only now have their warnings become accessible to the public. What good fortune it would have been if that had been at the time when those admonitions were uttered, since then the public would probably have reacted more constructively than those to whom those warnings were addressed.

Had the Public Known

It can be said without exaggeration that truly there are no current problems on which the published or unpublished works of E. Kardelj do not contain answers, not only in principle, but even very concrete answers. We are knocking on many doors that are already open. For example, there is a great deal of talk now about the harmfulness of "OUR-ization" [OUR = organization of associated labor] and the fragmentation of our economy, about local, republic or other barriers within the framework of the unified Yugoslav market, about the payments balances of the republics and about the further growth of our indebtedness, about the trade imbalance, the growth of imports, and especially about certain "manias" which have truly taken on proportions contrary to all good sense. These are the mania for investments, the mania for licenses, the mania for SIZ's [self-managing community of interest], etc. At the same time these developments are being linked to our system or even to its "Kardeljization," but no one mentions, or not sufficiently aware, that it was Comrade Kardelj who in the last years of his life waged a tireless struggle against precisely those things. "OUR-ization" is a particular danger to self-management, since there is no self-management without integration and association of the entire Yugoslav economy, Kardelj warned. Had the public known of certain timely warnings related to our present crisis, then certainly no one would have been able to sell it "a pig in a poke," nor speak about the need for "de-Kardeljization" of the system. It would be easier to know who is only verbally and who is really in favor of Tito's road to socialism and continuation of that road, to know what the real resistance and lack of comprehension is, and to know what is outright "rooting" for someone else's solution to problems which are above all ours. The public must know at least by now that Comrades Tito and Kardelj noted in time, issued warnings and vigorously fought for resolution of the problems which have now taken on proportions that are disturbing to everyone.

First about our present crisis situation. Comrade Kardelj "sounded the alarm" back in 1974, at the time when the negative impact of the world economic crisis was just beginning to be felt. Together with Comrade Tito he emphasized the need for economic stabilization as an essential precondition for our internal stability and independent international position, and he advocated an entire program of stabilization measures.

From 1977 up until his death Comrade Kardelj was extremely worried by the deterioration of our economic situation, especially by the uncontrolled growth of all forms of spending, prices, the payments deficit and the contracting of indebtedness, and that not only to cover the mania for investments, but also imports and current spending. Disappointed that his warnings had not been received with enough seriousness and responsibility, he openly cautioned that "this is not at all a time for arguing about whether the situation should be dramatized, about whether matters are critical, since the figures are serious enough in and of themselves."

Now they are far more serious, and yet some people are still amazed that our present difficulties are being "dramatized." For Kardelj to sound the alarm was not to "cause a panic," but to responsibly discharge obligations and duties. Just before his death Comrade Kardelj even warned that if we failed to straighten out the situation in a radical way we could experience the "fate of Chile," which was preceded by economic chaos and domestic destabilization. He thought about presenting his fear in public in the form of an interview or the like. Now when his most pessimistic fears are being borne out, there is a need not only for the public to know what kind of warnings those were, but also to define its attitude toward solutions which Comrade Kardelj was not able to carry through.

Against "Octuplication" of Capacities

Kardelj was energetically opposed to the mania for contracting foreign indebtedness at a time when this had not yet taken on the proportions which have in recent years brought us to a level of indebtedness that is truly beyond all justifiability. He was for credits not being taken to resolve our current problems, but exclusively for the needs of development. Even today we are in a situation where we are taking credit even for petroleum. He also called for matters to be put to rights in the entire domain of our economic relations with foreign countries, in which extreme liberalism and lack of organization predominate. He was also specifically concerned with the problems of our foreign trade network, and he suggested that a law be passed which would serve as the foundation for prohibiting the operation of our representative offices abroad which handle only import transactions. All import transactions should be conducted within the country, and anyone interested in selling should come to Yugoslavia and here in the country buy what fits into our priorities from the standpoint of the associated Yugoslav economy.

As for modernization of our economy, Kardelj was for purchasing technology on the basis of the coordinated priorities of the associated Yugoslav economy rather than for all possible licenses and technologies of all manner of producers to be obtained through a mania for licenses and joint ventures. That is why he condemned cases not only of duplication, but of "octuplication" of capacities.

Recently there has been much justified public criticism of the SIZ's. There is talk not only of SIZ-omania, but even of actual SIZ-ophrenia. However, even in this case not enough people know that Kardelj was more severe in his criticism of the practice of the SIZ's than our critics today. He warned back in 1974 that "if we allow things to get out of hand in the SIZ's, those who are attacking our system of self-management will bend this to their own end." He was the first to begin talking about SIZ-omania and even about SIZ-ocracy as a new variety of our technobureaucracy. If things are left to go their own way, Kardelj said, another form of government bodies will be created: in other words, what our present critics of the SIZ's detect as their parastatal functions. In other words, according to Kardelj, if this practice were to continue, then we would create a kind of "parallel government" in society which we would one day have to "destroy by revolutionary means."

Unfortunately, we have continued with that practice and we have reached the point Kardelj warned about, but the public is not aware of those warnings of his. The SIZ's, especially in the domain of material production, ought not to have power, nor funds, nor a staff. In practice, they today have a staff which according to certain estimates (about 50,000) is threefold greater than the number of people on the federal payroll. Not only does this staff have power, but that power has taken on a character which is leading toward new forms of alienation of the working class from management of the results of its labor.

Accordingly, when we speak of "Kardeljization" or "de-Kardeljization" of our practice, the public must be aware of Kardelj's authentic warnings and positions. They exist not only concerning the several issues we have just mentioned, but also, I repeat, on practically all our current problems and difficulties.

The question inevitably arises how it is possible that Comrade Kardelj did not manage to put through the solutions he advocated jointly with Comrade Tito? Had he succeeded in this, we certainly would not have been in these difficulties. One should not forget that the role of Comrade Kardelj was inestimable as the "most imaginative architect of the Tito era," that we have the foundations of our strategy already built, that we have the constitution, the Law on Associated Labor, and a number of laws embodying the system, and that the directions for development of the political system have been set down and were adopted as the basic decision of the 11th LCY Congress. All of this has been adopted as by plebiscite as the "rules of the game" of our society.

However, Comrade Kardelj did not hide the fact that in the practical implementation of the policy that had been adopted, especially in a society like ours, there are not only objective difficulties and lack of understanding, but also open resistance. Never did Kardelj dogmatically defend any solutions or commitments on our road toward the building of socialism. As a matter of fact, it was he who wrote the famous sentence in the LCY Program to the effect that "nothing is sacred." However, he was uncompromising when it came to the foundations of the system and our ideological and strategic commitments. And it is precisely they which are under attack during this crisis in the seventies, which, according to Kardelj, "must never be allowed to happen again." Then, as indeed now, the technobureaucratic forces, in a tie-up with nationalism especially, are becoming the greatest danger to authentic socialist self-management.

Kardelj advocated concrete resolution of concrete problems in accordance with the undisputed and generally accepted goals. It is only along that road that the real answer can be found as to where the problem is and what should be changed: practice or a particular solution? That is why, according to Kardelj, the concrete problems must always be resolved in "an unceasing checking against the revolutionary goals of our society." Now that we have gotten into a crisis situation, it is time to adopt that pattern of action.

EXCESSIVE FEDERAL STAFFS, PRIVILEGES DUE FOR CUTS

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1608, 25 Oct 81 pp 20-21

[Interview with Rajko Gagovic, chairman of Administrative Commission of Yugoslav Assembly, by Dragan Jovanovic: "A Fifth Are Superfluous"--date and place of interview not specified]

[Text] Since last Wednesday, officials' apartments and Mercedes with low registrations have again been in the public eye. A committee of the Federal Council for Sociopolitical Relations of the Assembly of Yugoslavia has approved a proposed change in the law on the issue of official apartments and the use of official automobiles, a law which is to be in effect by November. All of this did not take place without the usual delegates and others being upset as usual.

Rajko Gagovic, the chairman of the Administrative Commission of the SFRY Assembly, feels that there is not much new to say about the apartments and Mercedes, except the bleak but clear provisions with which the public is already familiar. For Gagovic, the automobiles are "exaggerated and disappearing trivia" from the life of the federal administration.

When he says that the use of apartments and Mercedes is trivia, Gagovic is referring to something else: "I assert that in the sociopolitical relations of the SFRY Assembly and in the federal administration in general, there are many more employees and officials than necessary. A great deal would be saved if numbers of positions were reduced and if a new systematization and a better organization of labor took place. Even labor discipline in the federal administration is fairly lax--from being late to work, taking coffee breaks during working hours and holding unnecessary meetings, to using annual leave in two or three parts, while it is difficult to punish a nonworker in the administration. A program is being prepared right now according to which the number of employees is to be reduced in the next 5 years, and the administration is to be organized more efficiently."

[Question] Is it known at least approximately how many superfluous employees and officials there are?

[Answer] "About 15,000 people are employed in the federal administration, and about 700 employees and officials in the Assembly of Yugoslavia. I do not know how much of a reduction would have to be made in the federal administration in general, but in the Assembly of Yugoslavia at least 20 percent of the employees and officials are superfluous," says Gagovic.

[Question] Still, could we say something about apartments?

Ordinary Efficiency Apartments and Two-Room Ones

[Answer] So far, the apartments, as a rule, have been issued to officials for long-term use. According to the new decision, which will probably come into effect by November, the apartments will be given for official use as long as the employment lasts, and now a 1-year term is most frequent. Thus, an official, a user of an apartment, who comes to Belgrade, does not abandon the apartment in the republic or province from which he comes, but rather in Belgrade receives an efficiency or at most a two-room apartment which he has to give back at the end of the year.

[Question] What will determine the size of the apartment received?

[Answer] This primarily depends on the importance of his position, his years of service, and the entertainment requirements of the position. For example, the president of the Federal Executive Council and the assistant secretary for finances cannot have the same apartment, the more so because 2 years ago both the president of the Federal Executive Council and the president of the SFRY Assembly renounced the right to a residence.

[Question] Are there also two-room efficiency apartments?

[Answer] Yes, there are also two-room ones, and there are also both furnished and unfurnished apartments, and larger rents.

[Question] Who receives an apartment in Belgrade?

[Answer] Only officials who serve for a term of 4 or 8 years, and these are mostly judges of the supreme or constitutional courts and other judicial organs.

[Question] Who can receive an apartment in Belgrade, on a long-term basis and according to the new law?

[Answer] Only an official who has left an apartment in his previous place of residence, or one who is retiring at the expiration of his position and wishes to remain in Belgrade.

[Question] Can officials change their apartments?

[Answer] They can exchange smaller ones for larger ones, especially if their families become larger, but according to the new regulations they will not be able to exchange one larger one for two smaller ones, and an official apartment cannot be inherited. It is felt that these innovations alone will introduce more efficiency and more funds for residential construction. Naturally, irregularities and manipulations of official apartments will be avoided; these have taken place, and as a result of them the residential fund of federal organs and organizations has been depleted and the records have become unreliable.

Mercedes With One Passenger

Gagovic also responded willingly to questions about the new regulations for the use of official automobiles. We will single out only the answers that the daily press, interpreting the new provisions, has not mentioned. Trips with an official automobile outside Belgrade for employees of the SFRY Assembly are approved personally by the secretary general of the assembly, and trips by official vehicles to foreign countries can be approved only by the president of the Assembly of Yugoslavia. Next, an assembly employee can use an official car only if he is doing work for the SFRY Assembly, and not other sociopolitical work, such as, let us say, leaving for a republican congress. The number of users who have a right to transportation from home to work has been drastically reduced. In addition to the president of the SFRY Assembly and the president of the Federal Executive Council, this right was retained only by the vice president of the assembly, the members of the Federal Executive Council, the presidents of assembly councils, the general secretary and several others.

[Question] In last week's assembly debate, delegate Ilija Bukic asked why official automobiles are used most on Saturdays and Sundays.

[Answer] "We checked, and this is not correct," Gagovic replied forcefully.

Here, our interlocutor considered it appropriate to mention as well other conservation measures taken by the federation. First, entertainment allowances, except for foreigners, have been completely abolished. "Find in any prominent Belgrade restaurant or hotel a domestic commercial meal that we have paid for, report it to me, and I will pay you for it in gold," says Gagovic. "Alcoholic beverages are no longer poured in the offices of officials. Only one reception has remained in the protocol of the federation, the one for 29 November. Trips abroad have been restricted, and will be limited even more, except for the Federal Secretariat for Foreign Affairs."

Our interlocutor, however, still remains faithful to the position mentioned at the beginning of this article, according to which these are trifles that really mean a fair amount.

In a report recently sent by the Federal Executive Council to the delegates of the Federal Council, it is said that: "...it is felt that there are not too many unassigned and available workers..." And there are "only" 180 of them.

Is this also a trifle?

ABSENCE OF OFFICIALS' INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY EXPLORED

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1609, 1 Nov 81 pp 24-25

[Article by Nenad I. Kecmanovic]

[Text] What is a capable politician in a socialistic, self-managed society? Is it a man who possesses a broad, universal cultural knowledge, or who primarily possesses some specialized knowledge, or, is it most important that he be thoroughly versed in Marxism?

How much would the possible comprehension of the more specific characteristics of politics as a profession, or about the optimal characteristics of its representatives, their inherent inclinations, be able to help us in the realization of democratic elections and of socialistic self-management personnel policy? A great deal, of course, but not enough considering that our public has a quite insignificant insight into the individual qualities of its representatives in professional politics, much less be able to point with confidence at the competent or the incompetent.

Institutions and the "Free-shooters"

It is interesting that the struggle against the forum style of work, decisionmaking by cabinet, and the closed nature of the political structure to the eyes and ears of the public, has never, at least not explicitly, encompassed the struggle for the democratic verification of the personal contribution of each social and political worker as well. In the tradition of our political life, the focus has always been placed ont the authority of the institution, the organ and the organization, but the individual public remarks, which stand out even less than the agreed upon positions, except when one is dealing with a small group of the most distinguished leaders, are treated as "butting in," "free-shooting," "being in too much of a hurry," acting in an undisciplined manner, trying to act like a leader, having an unhealthy ambition to distinguish oneself, etc.

In an interview last year for the DELO of Ljubljana, Stipe Suvar grappled with this problem: "You say that it is not possible for the man whom everyone applauds to be a good politician; I say that he is good who does not profess. If a man professes, then he can be extremely ambiguous. If someone wants to pursue a political career in peacetime, he will do best if he does not break the rule, in an almost religious sense, what is allowed and what is not. For the most part, these are not legally formed rules. Every large organization spawns its internal rules of life and behavior. That is why it is very important how a man fits into the organization and that he not stick out, that everyting for the most part is in order. No one bothers you, and you yourself don't bother anyone."

The struggle between different opinions is basically desirable and probably is expressed in closed meetings of the appropriate political forums, but these differences in viewpoint usually do not leave these meetings. As a rule, unified positions are disclosed to the public, originally by the leading people, and the rest are repeated in developed form, so that both the individual contributions and failures continually remain unknown for the electorate. That is why the phenomenon of retirement under the pressure of public opinion is unknown in our system, in the same way that political ascent on the basis of mass support and popularity is also unheard of. No reasonable person accuses the minister of a particular area for a foreign-trade imbalance, no one holds the finance minister reponsible for inflation, or the person responsible for ensuring supplies for shortages of coffee or oil.

But then it remains for us to ask: How do we know who is a capable politician and who is not, or, for whom do we vote and for whom do we not?

It might be said that the young generation of our political officials, lacking the "revolutionary pedigree" from the period of the underground, wartime whirlwind and the socialistic restoration, is particularly handicapped by the delineated style of lack of exposure. Personal capability and individual contribution have, indeed, very little opportunity to break out of the apparition of the authority of the office for which they are employed, or the organ or institution in which they operate.

The Tito initiative had, it seems to us, in addition to everything else, the objective of overcoming these weaknesses in our political life. Collective labor and responsibility, that is, decisionmaking and governing, and the limitation of the mandate must directly expand the creative expression of all members of the political leadership, and do this at all levels, it must provoke the constructive competition of capabilities, and in particular, their public affirmation, which may be the only way of establishing the trust and support of the masses, not only in the election process. A one-sided interpretation of the Tito initiative which would only proceed in the direction of removing the perennial supremacy of isolated officials at the head of the governing political bodies, would bring as much harm as it would benefit. This would only be a step further in the strengthening of some abstract collective authority which would be constructed on the impersonality of its active adherents. If nothing else, this version of the Tito initiative, which would de facto eliminate every personality from the Yugoslav political scene, would take the procedure of political elections down a literal blind alley.

Teamwork is not an attack on individual creativity. When our football team provides fine collective play in front of thousands of people at the stadium and millions of viewers on television, then even those who are not experts in sports can clearly see which players shine and which disappoint. When we are talking about our political team, the individual contribution remains, on the whole, unknown to the public; only the experts know who is doing what.

Discussing this problem in either context, Brank Mikulic at one time stressed that the Tito initiative did not have as its purpose the destruction of the social prestige of our distinguished social and political workers, but only to free it of the mystification which the function sometimes represents. He illustrated this with examples from Kardelj and Vlahovic and still other giants of our revolution, who in recent years have not found their political activities at the head of any organ or organization, but in spite of this neither their work nor their personalities have lost any of the former authority. As a supplement to the Mikulic evaluation, we might also cite contemporary examples of discussions which have been conducted in the highest state and party bodies of the federation right after the dramatic events in Kosovo. The frank, energetic, and well-considered statements of Lazar Kolisevski, Danet Cujic, Slavko Sajber, Bosko Siljanovski, Vojo Srzentic, and many other social and political workers from all areas of our country were given no less attention than the presentations of the authors who presided over the meetings of these organs. In brief, these were positive, and fortunately, not isolated examples of public affirmation of individual access and contribution in the line of programed determinations of our society, and these were independent of the authority of the various functions which these people momentarily occupied, which means they were precisely in the spirit of the authentic understanding of the Tito initiative.

A Screen To Hide Political Silence

On the other hand, the opportunisitc passivity, playing the waiting game, playing it safe, careerism, avoidance of personal responsibility, the impoverishment, or the concealment of one' own position, the withdrawal into the anonymity of would-be collective work, do not represent only the universal pathological syndrome of behavior inside the socialistic, self-management society, but also the special problem in carrying out democratic elections. Quite simply, how do you vote for someone who continuously refuses to establish open and sincere, let alone political, contact with you. It would be futile to try to remove this from the new columns, the screen, the radio waves, the meetings and the speaker's platform if, as Milovan Danojlic would say, one suffers from logorrhea (the disease of loquaciousness). "A man does not only speak when he has something to say, but also when he does not. As well as so many other talents, the power of speech can be twisted and directed at the wrong purposes, but it cannot be revoked. Then comes a break in the process of communication; the beginning of babbling, of talking for the sake of talking.... Everywhere the content is empty, and the purpose is only that of talking." When he suffers from acute logorrhea, the politician blocks communication with the electorate. The barrage of noisy and empty phrases which are foolishly repeated has to serve as an imposing screen for political silence.

When its existing, two-way, officially proclaimed line of communication is interrupted, the base is inclined to establish a one-way, informal, underground connection. To put it in more specific terms: concerning the politician of whom one does not know what he has done or what he has failed to do, where he has hit and where he has missed, what he thinks and to what extent he tries to hear the voice of the people, there begins to take place an increase in the guessing, the assumptions, the slander, the retelling of stories, the gossip, the fabrications, the half-truths, good and bad, but always incomplete accounts of the truth. The lack of genuine information which concerns us is legitimately compensated for by people's imagination, always ready to be stimulated by the slightest kernel of truth.

Private and Public Life of Elected Officials

Even in the scope of reviewing the so-called private life of a "political personality," to which the electorate is by right not indifferent, we, it seems, have still not found the proper solution. We care quite justified in our negative assessment of the Western model with its sensationalistic invasion into the personal and family life of the stars of the political scene, as well as of the Eastern model which unnaturally reduces the image of the distinguished politician to a function, and which wraps everything that comes out of this strict, official, rigid framework in a veil of mystery. Our own model, which should exemplify our social and political context and the spirit of the times, we have not, however, constructed and defined more precisely. Having abandoned the wartime and postwar formula of publicly verified asceticism even outside of the job, which legitimately brought forth many tragicomic excesses, we went, one should say, to the other extreme in the treatment of the right to a private life. Complete separation of private and public life is not only against communist ethics, but in some excessive manifestations has promoted the sort of example of double-standard morality and lifestyle which falls below the level of civil norms of behavior.

In the light of all the problems enumerated above, the no less insignificant dilemna about whether to put one or more candidates before the electorate, around which our pre-election discussions usually turn, can seem like getting off the track. As soon as it is so, it will no longer be a problem: all of the discussions in principle long ago gave the unambiguous response that every election means an alternative. But does the problem amount only to this?

TALES OF FORCED MIGRATION FROM KOSOVO RECOUNTED

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1612, 22 Nov 81 pp 20-21

[Article by Aleksandar Tijanic: "Why They Left"]

[Text] Dragoslav Stankovic, a peasant from near Gnjilane, who now lives in Smederevo, explained his departure from Kosovo this way:

"You have to get out when the blame is not put on those who do the beating, but those who are beaten!" Dragoslav planted wheat on his field in Kosovo in 1979. When he went from Smederevo to reap it, there was not a single spike left in the field--all had been reaped and carried away. Judicial proceedings against the robbers are still going on. He told this in a meeting of Serbs and Montenegrins who had left Kosovo and settled in Smederevo Opstina with representatives of the opstina commission for investigating emigration, as well as with Hisen Prekazi and Vukasin Jokanovic from the provincial commission and Miodrag Trifunovic, a member of the republic commission.

This was a meeting which was held last Friday in the auditorium of the Slavija Local Community in Smederevo; it lasted exactly 5 hours. Some 100 immigrants out of the total 6,000 in this opstina attended the meeting. They were all men, mostly between the ages of 40 and 50 who had immigrated here between 1955 and 1981.

Reasons and Destinies

Aside from one physician and a few retired people, those in the auditorium also included lawyers, professional managers, and engineers, but most were workers and farm laborers.

Those who attended were informed that a working group had been created in Serbia to analyze the emigration. In its work it is using the materials of opstina commissions; then a survey conducted among 5,000 emigrants; 1,800 people have been interviewed; complaints and charges filed with republic agencies have been analyzed; and statistical data and information of law enforcement agencies have been used. All of this, it was said, comprises a sound basis for analyzing the causes of the emigration and for formulating proposals for a long-term solution of this problem. The analysis has shown that the predominant reasons for emigration were various forms of pressure in the workplace, on the street, in schools, on farms.... This analysis, the audience was told that evening, has been examined in a meeting of the Serbian Republic Executive Council and the Federal Executive Council.

"Since the provincial committee is at the end of its task, frank and direct conversation in the presence of the comrades from Kosovo concerning the causes of your emigration will be useful to them in this responsible task," Miodrag Trifunovic said.

Hisen Prekazi then added that such talks had already been held in Kraljevo and Kragujevac and that they are a valuable contribution to an objective analysis.

Some 20 people spoke up. Among the first was Branko Miselic, who left Pristina in 1969. He had been chief of the department for municipal services in Pristina when in 1968 he was beaten when he and a group of activists were attempting to prevent demonstrators from demolishing the city. He moved away when, as he says, he realized that the demonstrators were under "someone's protection." In Smederevo he has become manager of an enterprise, but he says that he had it better in Kosovo. That is where his friends and relatives have remained.

"My in-laws, who live on Goles, complained that their Albanian neighbors have intentionally driven livestock onto their farm. I went to the local community, later even to the police, to seek protection for them. They replied that there is a commission which is resolving problems of this kind. These people simply do not understand--when the most reputable owner of a farm leaves a village because of pressure, the other Serbs and Montenegrins immediately ask themselves: What reason is there now for us to wait?" Miselic said.

Podujevo Opstina has a population of 77,000. Back 20 years ago there were 10,000 Serbs and Montenegrins living there. Today, according to published figures, there is a total of 2,860. Svetozar Garic moved out of Donja Dubnica near Podujevo 6 years ago. He says that for all practical purposes there is not a single Serbian family left in that village which was once predominantly Serbs.

"We did not leave for economic reasons; we had large farms there. Most of my fellow villagers left because of a conflict with Albanian neighbors. For years their livestock had been destroying my crops. They would beat my children between home and school. That is why I transferred them to a school several kilometers away and they would take a roundabout route. I decided in spite of everything to stay in Dubnica at all costs. However, little by little I was left by myself. And then there were troubles one after another at work, and twice I was laid off. It became impossible. I boarded up the windows and door in a five-room house, left behind 10 hectares of fields and forest and came here to live as a subtenant. I tried to sell the farm, but my neighbors drove all the purchasers away with threats that they intended to buy the farm. I put a value of 270 million on the land and buildings: they told me that 90 was enough. While I was here, the neighbors cut down the trees in my woods, their livestock grazed on my grass, so now they do not even need to purchase the farm. They are not even members of the human race."

Jerotije Petrovic from Ajvalija spent 22 years in the mines together with the miners as a highly skilled mechanic.

"I saw that the situation was bad when the manager found me talking Serbian to a friend, Goranac, whom he shouted out to speak Albanian to me. A few days later Redza happened to fall asleep by the water pump, and 300 miners were waiting for the water to recede. The young technician who had just come from Kragujevac woke up Redza, and the latter responded by breaking two of his teeth. The lad packed up and returned to Kragujevac the same day. It was then that I thought perhaps it was time for me to go, too. I had 1.5 hectares of land which an Albanian neighbor had his eye on. I went to mow the hay when I heard a clicking behind me. I turned around, and my neighbor was reloading his pistol. I asked him: 'Say, neighbor, what are you doing there?' And he said: 'Get out of the field, a darkness has fallen upon my eyes, I cannot see anything!' Thus I fled, leaving behind my scythe, my farm and my house. For a long time I was unable to sell what I had built up in 22 years of work in the mine, since my neighbor had got word around that it was his field. I sold the farm with the help of an honest Albanian, to whom I gave a good commission, and he found me a buyer in some other village. The purchaser, an Albanian, had five sons and was not afraid of my neighbor. I told him everything--that he had been threatening and that he had been demanding my field. He said: Let him go screw himself, I am buying it with my own money!"

Dragomir Stevic, lawyer, came from Pristina in 1973, but he often goes to Kosovo to see his relatives and friends:

"I feel a moral duty here to say how many honest Albanians there are, my comrades, colleagues and acquaintances, people whom I am glad to see even today. In the present situation, believe me, it is hardest on them," Stevic said among other things.

General and Specific Parts

And thus word by word, for all of 5 hours. The people from Kosovo noted down every fact. Thus a place was also found for a certain policeman named Zeco, a village tyrant, from whom, someone said, they "received many a blow."

If we set aside the portions of the statements which have to do with actions set in Kosovo on the basis of emotional subjectivity, and they occur everywhere, the following facts remain. Almost all the immigrants, those who spoke up and those with whom we conversed, asserted that they were better off materially in Kosovo. They said that by selling their houses, livestock and farms they had become poor people instead of property owners. They said that direct pressure was exerted on them or that they felt the general climate to be pressure. They argue that other members of their families had also been subjected to pressure.

They said that there was no effective protection against the bullying either from the police or the courts. They then added that they sold their property below its value, but in spite of everything, they said, they would gladly return to Kosovo if conditions were different.

There were people emigrating even from the end of the war, but emigration was more intensive after 1966 and 1968, and then, because of well-known circumstances, in 1981 the emigration took on the form of flight, the emigrants said.

At the end of the meeting we asked Vukasin Jokanovic if the reasons mentioned for emigration were the same as those alleged by people in Kosovo in their application for emigration. Jokanovic said that the applications are not identical, and that the people in Kosovo, aiming at an early departure, are avoiding complications and are giving other reasons in their statements. That is why, according to him, the commission there does not consider their statements to be objective.

The differences in the statements are obvicus. This leads one to reflect that the conclusions and indeed even the solutions offered, both in Kosovo and outside it, could vary. Perhaps this is one of the reasons why a section of the provincial commission was talking to emigrants in these cities in Serbia. In Smederevo we were unable to obtain the analysis of the commission there, since, we were told, it had been classified as a "government secret." Some of the figures are known from Kosovo. In Pristina there were 1,265 applications for emigration between 11 March and 9 November. Of the 930 applications examined, some kind of pressure is mentioned in only 8 cases. In 10 years 2,750 people left Urosevac. Officially only one because of pressure: a bus driver who got in an argument with an Albanian passenger and after that left for Krusevac.

The new situation obviously imposes the need to search for dual causes: causes for the emigration of Serbs and Montenegrins from Kosovo and causes behind their giving false reasons in their applications, which they change after they leave Kosovo. Speaking about this, Sefki Ferovic, chairman of the commission in Pristina, said that in Kosovo there is not enough activity in the effort to combat all forms of pressures by Albanian nationalism and that there are cases of opportunism, of refraining from accusations, of avoiding conflict in the taking of political and legal measures against the Albanian and other chauvinists. This was also confirmed by the people in Smederevo, who say that they do not yet see the real effect of the effort to create conditions which would prevent a large-scale exodus. If nothing radical is done soon, they say, then later it perhaps will not have any practical value at all.

The commissions are readier to grant consent to emigration if the grounds are "embellished." Once their consent is obtained, there is no problem obtaining the notice of departure from the police; this certificate is in turn necessary to give notice of one's taking up residence somewhere else. If specific pressure is alleged as the reason--there is no consent to the departure until the accuracy of the testimony is established. Thus the commission has become an administrative barrier to emigration. Many people are leaving even without the consent. That has led to an obvious change of argument: instead of analyzing the cause of emigration, the commissions are studying the justifiability of applications for emigration. The number of applications directed is not small--in Pristina alone 274 have been rejected out of a total of 930. This also suggests that the committee is in a way expanding its powers even beyond the constitutional principles concerning the freedom of movement and choice of place to live and work.

In the joint session of the Presidium of the Serbian LC [League of Communists] Central Committee and the Presidency of SR [Socialist Republic] Serbia on Monday it was emphasized that it was indispensable to take all necessary political and other measures to halt the emigration from Kosovo, to guarantee creation of conditions for return of those families who emigrated under various pressures and want to go back, and to study the possibilities of a fair reimbursement of those citizens who sold their property under various pressures at a price below the real value.

At the end of the Smederevo meeting someone asked Prekazi whether people in the province were examining the possibilities for a return of Serbs and Montenegrins who had moved out of Kosovo?

"Eh, if we were able to bring back two or three for a start, it would be a great encouragement for all of us," Prekazi said.

SELF-MANAGING INTEREST COMMUNITIES UNDER FIRE

'Struggle Between Two Bureaucracies'

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1610, 8 Nov 81 pp 12-14

[Article by Scepan Rabrenovic: "Money From Someone Else's Pocket"]

[Text] Do you perhaps know how many self-managing communities of interest there are in the country? According to the most recent statistical data, last year there were precisely 7,826 of them, or about 300 more than in the previous year. It is equally true that there are more of them today than there were yesterday and that tomorrow there may be more of them than there are today.

At a meeting in Belgrade a few days ago it was said that the way things are going, soon every street would have its own self-managing community of interest. It seems that whenever a problem is not clear to us or when agreement is not reached on the solution to a problem, we have to have another SIZ [self-managing community of interest]. And it also happens this way: as soon as a little bit of money is put together, a SIZ is established to spend it. And the SIZ's are past masters at that.

The problem, of course, does not lie in the number of SIZ's, but in the way they operate and the way they spend money. But that is not the whole matter: it is well known that the SIZ's have great power, that they are on a par with the government, and that the more money they have, the greater their power.

Last week in a session of the Federal Chamber of the Yugoslav Assembly in which implementation of the assembly resolution on the free exchange of labor was being debated Dr Boro Petkovski, a delegate, presented the datum in his introductory statement that 3,842 self-managing communities in the social services last year had at their disposition 18.7 percent of the total social product. We calculated that those "18.7 percent" amounted to about 290 billion dinars last year.

How much is 290 billion dinars? A great deal. Still more when we realize that about 167 billion dinars were left to the economy in that same year to expand plant and equipment and for reserves. And that in a year of which it is said that the position of the economy in distribution improved.

According to the most recent statistical data published by EKONOMSKA POLITIKA in Belgrade, the revenues of self-managing communities of interest in the social services in the first 8 months of this year amounted to 247 billion dinars, by the end of the year this amount will climb to 400 billion dinars, or about 100 billion dinars less than the net personal incomes that will be paid to employees in the economy.

It is not difficult to conclude on the basis of these figures that social service expenditure is high, that is, above the level of the country's economic development. In this situation both those furnishing the money and those spending it are dissatisfied. Associated labor because it is impoverished and because this impoverishment has lasted for a long time, and employees in the social services because the funds they have received are inadequate. It is quite certain that the standard of living of both has fallen since the self-managing communities of interest were established.

Both Are Poor

The problem seems to lie above all in unwise expenditure of money, and the money is being spent unwisely because of the autonomous and independent behavior of those who are spending it, frequently with the sponsorship of the SIZ's themselves. It is said, for example, that every opstina or regional self-managing community of interest for health care endeavors to have its own clinical centers with expensive equipment. The situation is similar with education: there has been a virtual deluge of junior and senior postsecondary schools.

But when the self-managing communities of interest were established, the intention was for them to be a place where the producers and those spending the money would reach agreement on their common interests, and the purpose of all this would be to increase the productivity of plant and equipment of associated labor. Fictitious illness and the numerous university students educated with no regard for the development of the economy can only increase the costs.

The social services have to be paid for, and no one disputes that. The question is only how to optimalize that payment and how those paying the bill are to have an insight into the spending of the funds. The supposition is that this will be possible by virtue of free exchange of labor through the self-managing communities of interest. It has turned out that this is neither free, nor is it an exchange of labor. There are quite a few people who now say that it is not even possible for labor to be exchanged: How, for example, are skilled and unskilled labor to be "exchanged"? One obstacle crippling the so-called free exchange of labor has been the fact that no true measure exists of the results of labor--not only of the results in the social services, but not even of the results in associated labor. How, then, is an exchange of labor going to occur at all? This is that pivotal question around which everything revolves, but it is also a question which is not being posed often enough.

Instead of that, we have been too much concerned, and we still are, with purely organizational matters: with the makeup of the self-managing communities of interest, with their proper number, with the question of the level at which they are to be established and how large their staff should be. On the basis of what was said in that session of the Federal Chamber of the Yugoslav Assembly, the self-managing communities of interest are not so much self-managing organizations as they are the long arm of the state or some kind of parallel government organizations. We quote the words of Dr Boro Petkovski: "The system of organization through self-managing communities of interest has shown a tendency to become independent of other essential components...the SIZ's have begun to develop into parastatal organizations of a sort...as protectors of the interests of society in the sphere of the social services."

And that, it was said, accounts for the "marked presence of state-ownership elements in social ownership." How else and otherwise to explain that the self-managing communities of interest are being financed fiscally--on a budgetary basis.

This method of financing has had the result that the funds appropriated are "lost," become anonymous, so that hardly anyone knows what is happening to them, how they are being spent--only the results are known, and they are not good. The self-managing communities of interest have almost become transformed into a prototype of a present-day bureaucratic institution--into the opposite, that is, of the model which was aimed at. In basic organizations of associated labor, for example, little is known about what is happening to the funds appropriated for housing construction and about all the channels through which those funds travel. Leave to one side that in many communities there are complaints that this money is being used to build stadiums or certain other projects--it is a fact that the resources are greater than the resulting housing units. Last year about 30 billion dinars earmarked for housing construction went unspent, and that in a situation of a housing shortage and when construction is becoming more and more expensive every day.

Hardly any notice was given to the statement which the trade union organization of the Beko clothing manufacturing firm of Belgrade prepared for the Third Congress of Self-Managers, in which it is evident that the workers of that work organization are setting aside more funds for housing construction every year than for investments in fixed capital, and that they are obtaining a negligibly small number of housing units in proportion to the funds appropriated. The Beko workers have therefore proposed that this kind of self-managing community of interest for housing be abolished.

Expenditures Which Have Been Hushed up

There are no figures on how much the staffs of the SIZ's cost. It seems that data on this are not recorded anywhere or are intentionally kept quiet. It is known only that last year the SIZ's as a whole employed 43,300 workers, who had an average monthly personal income of 8,757 dinars (employees in the economy earned 7,167 dinars last year on the average). It is also known that the SIZ's are categorized in statistical reports as sociopolitical communities and organizations. And not otherwise.

Were those the only costs, the economy could easily bear them, and the earnings of those 40,000 or so white-collar workers would not represent a great burden. It is known, however, that those are not the only costs, that there are also certain others--anonymous expenditures which are not recorded. Two surveys prove that this is so. According to the first, which was conducted by Josip Stohan of the Economics Institute in Zagreb, at the beginning of the seventies public service expenditure did not exceed the level of the country's economic development. According to studies done by Dr Zoran Popov of the Institute of Economic Science in Belgrade, moreover, the economy's legal obligations amounted to 22 percent of its income up to the mid-seventies. After that those legal obligations increased to 26 percent of the economy's income. And that is precisely the time when the self-managing communities of interest were established. That 4-percent increase applied to the income of the economy represents a huge amount of money, and if it is actually true that all those funds went to maintain the staff of the SIZ's, then it might be said that a "low blow was dealt" to the working class at that time.

How much the government has also participated in that "blow" has depended on the extent to which the sociopolitical communities were and are now in a tie-up with the SIZ's. According to what was said in the session of the Federal Chamber of the Yugoslav Assembly, that tie-up has existed--especially at the time when the self-managing communities of interest were established.

Over the past year more criticism of the operation of the self-managing communities of interest has been coming from government bodies and agencies than from associated labor. This is no accident. The self-managing communities of interest, by the very fact that they have resources, have taken power away from government bodies and agencies. A republic secretary for culture, for example, has today considerably less influence than the secretary of that republic's self-managing community for culture. That is why criticism of the operation of the self-managing communities of interest coming from government entities takes on the appearance of a kind of courting of the working class. Actually this is a conflict between two bureaucracies in a battle for power which for the present associated labor is observing almost disinterestedly, out of a conviction that it cannot change anything.

A More Correct Pay Envelope

The economic troubles and the problems related to stabilization have only hastened the effort to resolve the problem of financing the social services. Everyone agrees that the economy should be given relief, it has been announced that the federal budget next year will be only slightly larger than last year, and it is assumed that social service expenditure next year will also be growing more slowly. However, the problem of financing the social services is not an urgent one solely for that reason. The SIZ's have become independent, they represent a kind of alienated power in society, and the interests of associated labor have been subordinated to them. The question is only what is to replace them, that is, how associated labor is to be afforded a greater influence on the spending of funds and how all this is to be a function of the development of both the social services and the economy.

One belief is that the workers in associated labor would be more interested in the way these funds are spent if the provision of the Law on Associated Labor concerning personal incomes as a gross category containing all taxes and contributions burdening the worker's personal income were implemented. Only a "more correct pay envelope" would make it possible for the workers to see what they are financing and what amounts they are giving for that purpose. Solidarity funds are cited as an example of enhanced worker motivation in such a case: ever since the pay envelope has stated how much the worker is setting aside each month for the reconstruction of the Montenegrin coast, there have been more demands for closer monitoring of the expenditure of those funds. Previously, in the case of the earthquake in Skopje, for example, there were no such demands, since it did not say on the pay envelope how much each worker was setting aside each month to rebuild Skopje, but these funds were appropriated through a contribution which was not "visible" to the workers.

The influence of associated labor on the spending of these funds could also be achieved, according to some, if the funds were set aside on the basis of specific programs which would be adopted both by associated labor and also by the social services.

In a recent statement to NIN on the need for an economic and social reform, Dr Ljubisav Markovic, the well-known professor and economist and chairman of the Committee for the Plan of the Chamber of Republics and Provinces of the Yugoslav Assembly, said among other things: "There must be a thorough examination of the condition of the so-called special-interest organizations. A substantial portion of the services should be paid for out of the net income of economic organizations and the workers."

Interview With Assembly Personage

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1610, 8 Nov 81 pp 12-13

[Interview with Dr Miodrag Visnjic, chairman of the Commission of the Serbian Assembly for Special-Interest Organization in the Social Services, by Dragan Jovanovic: "It Is Not Just the SIZ's We Blame"; date and place not specified]

[Text] In the recent past, when talk is revived about SIZocracy, SIZomania and other "SIZisms," the fashionable anti-SIZ euphoria has been mentioned least. Dr Miodrag Visnjic, a man who by virtue of his political office and scientific affinity has been concerned with the self-managing communities of interest, let us know at the very outset of the interview that he has a somewhat different position on this issue.

The self-managing communities of interest have indeed with good reason been subjected to fierce criticism because of many shortcomings. There is no dispute about this. But the criticism ranges from certain demands for improvements to the idea of abolishing the SIZ's. What stands behind those demands for doing away with them? Is it a solution to return the funds to budget-financed agencies of the republics and opstinas? Dr Visnjic says.

[Question] What is the origin of these efforts?

[Answer] No distinction is made between criticism of the concept and criticism of practice. As for the theoretical concept of special-interest organization, perhaps we did not think everything through, but by and large the constitutional concept cannot be disputed. But the criticism of practice is by and large appropriate.

[Question] What should be done to bring the theory and the practice of the SIZ's into conformity?

[Answer] It is obvious that we need a radical step in optimalizing the structure of the SIZ's, since there are a very great many of them. They have been formed even for things that did not require them. Certain needs of the citizens and the working people and certain social services could have been met without organizing SIZ's. A SIZ for every street or for every facility leads nowhere. Especially when the attitude has been adopted: as soon as you call anything a SIZ, you must immediately give it social status and, of course, money. The most serious work is being done in the republic to unify related activities under one SIZ.

[Question] How is it that the SIZ's have become ossified bureaucratic bodies?

[Answer] Ever since the self-managing communities of interest were organized in 1974 we have been concerned mainly with their organizational aspect: how delegations were to be elected to their assemblies, how many delegations, and so on, and less concerned with the essential matters (free exchange of labor and income-sharing relations). Second, when in that same year, 1974, we made a model of the SIZ, we wanted to cram into it, as on Procrustes' bed, every form of self-managing special-interest organization. Thus in practice the SIZ's grew to become strong institutionalized organisms. But that was not Kardelj's thinking about them. He regarded them as flexible self-managing organisms in which OUR's [organization of associated labor] could come together with other OUR's and even enter into direct discussion and agreement on the rendering and use of services.

[Question] Is it true that there has been hardly any of that in practice?

[Answer] In practice the assemblies of the SIZ's, which are not yet an expression of operation on the basis of delegacy, have been dominant. It is in them that agreements are to be achieved, rather than for decisions to be made in the name of associated labor. And then the assemblies of the SIZ's ought to be smaller bodies and not representative bodies consisting of 100 delegates or more.

[Question] The special-interest communities, then, have become alienated from associated labor?

[Answer] Yes, an inversion has taken place: the SIZ's have tended more to take on the elements of government agencies instead of self-managing those government agencies. The logic whereby the social services operate regardless of the income earned in material production has not yet been overcome.

[Question] How does the workingman look on all this?

[Answer] The workingman still does not see any functional link between what he is setting aside for health care and education and what he is getting. We are still talking about gratis medical treatment and education, but all this is paid for, and the price is high. The workingman still does not feel that he can exert the kind of influence whereby he gets better services for larger appropriations. If the truth be known, he often does not even come into contact with those rendering the services. Thus in most cases both are dissatisfied.

[Question] How is one to explain this?

[Answer] By the inherited system of budget financing, which was carried over to the system for financing institutions even in the framework of the SIZ's. There have been no qualitative changes at all. Whatever was previously received as funding from the budget is by and large received even now from the contributions, plus that guaranteed 20 percent under the resolution for this year.

[Question] What is the relationship between the executive officers and bodies of the SIZ's and the administrative agencies of sociopolitical communities?

[Answer] One can speak both about dualism and also about a tie-up of these entities. The bodies of sociopolitical communities determine by law the size of the needs for social services, and the bodies of the SIZ's are supposed to meet those needs, although they do not participate in passing the law. One can also speak about a tie-up between the executive officers and agencies of sociopolitical communities and the organs of the SIZ's, and that tie-up, by the nature of the thing, is very dangerous.

[Question] What are all the things which should be borne in mind when the SIZ's are criticized?

[Answer] Aside from criticism being sound and serious, it should also be objective and realistic. That is, it must be recognized that the area for free exchange of labor is restricted: three-fourths of the OUR's do not even plan their own personnel, much less the needs for education and culture. And then we have not worked out criteria and scales for evaluating labor in the social services. Finally, delegate relations are underdeveloped, and there is administrative interventionism and a deliberate resistance on the part of certain structures toward special-interest organization.

[Question] Finally, are there also certain constructive processes taking place in special-interest organization?

[Answer] Certainly there are. At one time we criticized the surpluses in the treasuries of the SIZ's. At the beginning of this year we abolished the rates of the contributions of all republic special-interest communities in the social services except for pensions and sciences. These communities now obtain their funds through association, and what has happened? Instead of the surpluses, the republic self-managing communities of interest now have deficits. Some of the opstina special-interest communities are beginning to put their hands on the funds that are supposed to go to the region and the republic.

[Question] Let us end with the question we began with: Why has there been from time to time such an outcry about the SIZ's?

[Answer] For all the shortcomings and problems of the SIZ's, it seems that we have become just a bit too nervous about their not performing their function, but have we as a society provided all the conditions for them to function? Neither the SAWP, nor the trade union, nor the League of Communists has ever become truly involved in the battle for special-interest organization either in associated labor or in the local community. And back in 1974 it was stated that the SIZ is the touchstone and keystone of our system.

LILOV STATES DIFFERENCES OF OPINION IN POLICY OF 'PROBLEMS OF PEACE AND SOCIALISM'

Sofia RABOTNICHESKO DELO in Bulgarian 27 Nov 81 p 6

[Statement by Aleksandur Lilov at the international discussion by representatives of communist and workers parties of the periodical PROBLEMS OF PEACE AND SOCIALISM: "The Preservation of Peace Is the Main Task"]

[Text] Prague, 26 November (BTA). Aleksandur Lilov, Politburo member and secretary of the BCP Central Committee, head of the delegation of the Bulgarian Communist Party, was the first speaker at the morning session of the international conference of representatives of fraternal communist and workers parties which discussed the work of the periodical PROBLEMS OF PEACE AND SOCIALISM.

The BCP Central Committee, Aleksandur Lilov said, congratulates the international collective of the periodical PROBLEMS OF PEACE AND SOCIALISM for its successful activities of our common publication. The BCP accepts the report of the editors and gives a positive rating to the periodical's contribution to the dissemination of the theory and practice of Marxism-Leninism, the elaboration of contemporary problems of the international communist and workers movements, the exchange of valuable experience in the building of real socialism and the struggle against imperialism, neocolonialism and reaction and for peace, disarmament and detente.

To the extent of its possibilities, our party will continue to give comprehensive support to the periodical, which is a major permanent theoretical and informational link in the communist and workers movements. As a founder of the periodical, our party has been actively participating in all of its initiatives. Comrade Todor Zhivkov, BCP Central Committee general secretary, is one of its noted regular contributors on topical and complex problems. Other contributors include members of the Politburo, BCP Central Committee secretaries and noted Bulgarian scientists and public figures.

In Bulgaria, PROBLEMS OF PEACE AND SOCIALISM enjoys high prestige. It raises important and interesting problems, attracts competent authors, struggles for the purity and creative development of our revolutionary scientific theory and summarizes and offers to our party members and cadres the experience of Marxist-Leninist parties the world over.

We ascribe great importance to and rate positively the role of the periodical in the unification of the international communist and workers movements. Its very existence and regular publication are a manifestation of the parties' awareness of the need for unity and of the real existing unity within our movement. The periodical is a valuable result and factor of unity in the international communist and workers movements. To ignore or belittle this would be erroneous and, considering the current difficult international situation, also dangerous to the movement. We may be exigent and critical, we may dispute one or another piece of material in the periodical--this is normal and even necessary with such a multinational and multiparty periodical--but we cannot, we have no right to underestimate its unquestionable major and positive role.

Total harmony of thought and unanimity in a theoretical, not to mention a multiparty theoretical periodical is neither possible nor necessary. Differences may appear and, as we know, do appear, both in the movement and the periodical. They must be controlled on the basis of the Marxist-Leninist principles upon which relations among our parties are based today: proletarian internationalism, equality, independence and respect.

At the same time, we must possess the clear awareness that the vocation and main purpose of the periodical is to strengthen unity rather than intensify or aggravate differences in our movement. Our party cannot support the feeling of differences as being basic in the content and work of the periodical. We cannot underestimate differences by underestimating our unity, the more so since that which unites us is more essential and important than that which divides us at this time. It is as inadmissible to underestimate specifics and differences as it is to convert PROBLEMS OF PEACE AND SOCIALISM into a rostrum above all of differences in the international communist and workers movement.

The magazine reflects, as it should, the status of the movement, whose problems are, as they should be, problems of the periodical as well. However, not all problems and differences covered in the periodical must automatically develop into problems of the movement. We must learn how to work jointly even better. We must cooperate. We must discuss the conditions in which we find ourselves now, at the end of the 20th century, since we are aware of the vital need for unity within the movement and of the fact that the moment we lose our proletarian, socialist and communist solidarity and unity we will be exposing ourselves to a fatal danger and to the dislocation of international communist and workers movements.

The BCP believes that despite the features of the present stage or the differences and difficulties familiar to all of us within the international communist and workers movements, which have today reached a tremendous scale and tremendous successes and have entered the stage of their political, organizational and theoretical maturity, objective conditions exist for our joint political and theoretical periodical, which is our great common achievement, to continue to perform its highly responsible assignments successfully.

This can be achieved mainly if the periodical remains based on the positions of Marxism-Leninism and the editors continue to base their work on a principle-minded, constructive and democratic basis. If these prerequisites are observed there is no problem to which an acceptable solution cannot be found.

We approve the measures suggested in the report on improving the democratic nature of the management and activities of the periodical's editorial collective. We believe that the continued application of the principle of attentive and maximal consideration of the opinions of the representatives of all fraternal parties in discussing and approving materials going to press is proper and consistent with the contemporary situation in the communist movement. We especially support suggestions regarding the broadening of the tasks and functions of the editorial council and the creation of an international collective secretariat. This will improve the work of problem and regional commissions, particularly with a view to the further energizing of the work of all representatives of fraternal parties in the periodical's scientific-theoretical, informational and organizational activities.

It is in this context that we must consider the discussion on the periodical's work and content. This is not a question of procedural-organizational and political discussions but of theoretical discussions without which no science can develop, including our revolutionary Marxist-Leninist science. Instead of avoiding problems, we must discuss and resolve them in order to resolve them promptly and like Marxists. All of us must master the art of holding open and creative discussions and engaging in real theoretical arguments. This involves respect for the scientific method and arguments and for the viewpoint and positions held by our partners. It must be a discussion without anathemas or insinuations but also without circumvening or glossing over the main and sensitive problems. It must be a discussion based on the law of theoretical creativity. We must conduct our discussion of contemporary global problems and of our own struggle on a high theoretical and political level. This would provide the best indication of the health of the international communist movement. We are convinced that the periodical can make a great contribution to converting such discussions to a permanent style of communist theoretical thinking. Actually, it would be unfair not to point out that the periodical has already acquired some experience in this direction. Our party is in favor of the discussions held jointly with the other fraternal parties on central and topical problems organized by the periodical during the period under consideration. They have been mentioned in the report of the editorial collegium and editorial council. We are particularly pleased by the fact that the periodical's editors are aware of the still unused opportunities for the organization of truly creative discussions on problems vital to the communists and the working people and for the need to prepare them even more thoroughly in order to improve the lasting effect of our communist discussions.

The period covered in the report submitted at this conference by the periodical's editorial collegium and editorial council was saturated with changes in global developments and in our movement. In our view, PROBLEMS OF PEACE AND SOCIALISM remained in step with the tasks and struggles of our parties and our movement in this difficult situation. We are particularly pleased by the interest in and help given by the periodical by the BCP. A substantial number of materials from and for Bulgaria were published. The periodical was given the opportunity to study the work of party, scientific research and ideological institutions and to participate in the various international theoretical conferences and symposia held in Bulgaria and in the work of the World Parliament of Peoples for Peace which was held in Sofia. This year, we were visited by a group of representatives of communist parties from different areas, who are working with the periodical, and who studied our ideological work in connection with the celebration of the 90th anniversary of the founding of a revolutionary Marxist party in Bulgaria and the celebration of 1300th anniversary of the founding of the Bulgarian state. The result was the publication of a report to which we gave a positive rating.

In our view, the international theoretical conference held in Sofia on "The Building of Socialism and Communism and Global Developments," in December 1978 with the participation of delegations from 73 parties, 60 of which were headed by chairmen, general and first secretaries, politburo members and central committee secretaries and many noted scientists and theoreticians, was the most important manifestation of the joint work of the BCP with PROBLEMS OF PEACE AND SOCIALISM. Very valuable and extensive exchanges of ideas and experience related to main problems of global development took place. The conference contributed to strengthening the unity of our movement and quite clearly showed the need for political and theoretical contacts among Marxist-Leninist parties. Conferences of this type and level must be held more systematically.

The timely discussion of topical practical problems and the steady enhancement of the theoretical standard of materials published by the periodical and of the discussions it sponsors, on the basis of the increasingly extensive summation of the experience and theoretical contributions not only of all individual parties but of the overall experience of the entire communist movement are a decisive prerequisite for the success of the periodical and for enhancing its role in the movement.

We must continue to pay particular attention to the summation of acquired historical experience in building real socialism and above all the experience of the CPSU and the USSR. Allow me to point out that the question of solidarity with countries of victorious socialism, the USSR above all, has not become obsolete in the least. The BCP does not understand and rejects any other formulation of this matter. It is true that the CPSU and the USSR are not the leading center of the international communist and workers movements. This problem was clarified and resolved a long time ago. However, no one so far has disputed the historical fact that after the Great October Socialist Revolution the CPSU and the USSR were and remain the center and vanguard of contemporary social progress in the world, the contemporary revolutionary process and the contemporary struggle for peace and disarmament. Imperialism is well aware of this, and that is the precise reason for which it directs its main attacks against the USSR. This periodical of the international communist and workers movements acts properly in fighting anti-Sovietism as it continues to, as this is one of the main lines of imperialist ideology and policy. This in no case lowers or conflicts with its obligation of countering the attacks of imperialism mounted against other socialist countries and communist parties in the capitalist countries.

Something else: as members of the delegation of a country which is a member of the Warsaw Pact, we categorically state that the USSR, Bulgaria and the other socialist countries continue to support the idea of the simultaneous abrogation of the Warsaw Pact and NATO or, as a first step, the abolishment of their military organizations. We continue to struggle for this. The new program for peace for the 1980's does not reject or change but extends the current program in which this, like many other problems, has been given its clear solution familiar to all.

The collective measures organized by the periodical (theoretical conferences, symposia, round-table discussions, etc) make comparisons among the experience of individual parties possible. They enable us to determine and interpret the specific, the unique and the common features of this experience and to reach new knowledge and specific enrichment of our theory through collective efforts and comradely discussions.

Many scientific centers and Marxism-Leninism institutes are at work within the communist movement. They are engaged in relatively independent studies. It would be desirable for the periodical to publish theoretical results of collective scientific studies written not only by individual authors but by the respective institutes. This would give us one more opportunity to compare collective experience in scientific research and to popularize new theoretical summations.

Naturally, the meetings of fraternal parties (congresses, plenums, etc) are the main results of the collective creative efforts of the communists in the field of theory. The periodical must find ways to compare, sum up and popularize such exceptionally valuable experience.

In 1982 Bulgaria will celebrate the centennial of Georgi Dimitrov's birth. We hope that the periodical will publish a profound theoretical study of the most valuable traditions and materials on the growth of our movement starting with the period of the comintern and to bring to light the durable significance of a number of theoretical-methodological concepts which the great Georgi Dimitrov formulated and applied.

The BCP Central Committee is planning to hold an international theoretical conference on the work of Georgi Dimitrov and our contemporaneity in June 1982 and invites all Marxist-Leninist parties represented at the conference and members of the periodical to participate in it. Before the end of the year the BCP will issue official invitations and provide all parties with the necessary information.

Our international periodical has information tasks as well. Specific actual information about the experience of individual parties is extremely necessary and the periodical is doing useful work in this direction. It would be desirable to present this experience on the level of a theoretical interpretation rather than merely as a description of facts.

Everything seems to indicate that the 1980's will be an exceptionally difficult and important period in the struggle of the international communist and workers movements and, consequently, in terms of the periodical's activities.

We are facing a new political situation which is considerably different from that of the 1970's. Its main feature is the attempt on the part of imperialism, American imperialism above all, to put an end to detente and to replace it with a policy of aspiration toward one-sided military superiority. This will inevitably result in another quantitative and qualitative arms race, i.e., a policy of balancing on the brink of nuclear catastrophe.

Today, at the start of the 1980's, we are witnessing a violent global clash and an intensive struggle along two basic and determining directions in world politics: between the safeguarding of peace and cooperation among nations and international tension, new arms race and preparations for a thermonuclear war. This is a struggle between the socialist and imperialist lines and between the course followed by the USSR and the United States. The destiny and future of mankind depend on which line will prevail and which path will be taken--that of detente or that of a new arms race.

All of us realize that the main task today is the preservation of the peace and detente and the avoidance of war. No task is more important today. Consequently, problems of peace and war must be given priority in PROBLEMS OF PEACE AND SOCIALISM. We have entered a period in which this periodical must justify its title most categorically and in all directions, as follows:

As a source of information;

As a theoretical rostrum;

As a propagandist;

As the discoverer of new forces, allies and trends;

As organizer of the masses;

As a summarizer of experience;

And as a laboratory for new ideas and initiatives.

The periodical must become particularly active in all of these directions and bring to light the significance of the peace program for the 1980's, as approved by the 26th CPSU Congress, support and implementation of the peaceful initiatives of the USSR and the socialist countries and of the communist parties and peaceloving forces in the nonsocialist countries, and the even greater development of the new antiwar movement in Western Europe and the rest of the world.

As regards China, the periodical is following the right line. We respect and will continue to respect the Chinese people and the Chinese socialist revolution, which was one of the great events of our time. The periodical must not criticize the PRC and the Chinese Communist Party in general, despite major existing differences. We are criticizing the foreign policy of the Chinese leadership, which is erroneous and dangerous to the cause of socialism. It is a policy which aligns socialist China openly and officially with imperialism. It is not a class policy or the right way. We state and substantiate this clearly. Today the "China trump" is the main direction followed by American imperialism in its aggressive policy. This is a fact which must not be underestimated by any one of our parties.

However, the 1980's faces not only a new political but a new ideological situation in the world.

The periodical must play an important role in the study, characterization and assessment of the contemporary ideological situation and struggle and thus help our parties to formulate a proper ideological strategy for the new circumstances.

A major distinguishing feature of the newly developing situation is that today the ideological struggle between socialism and capitalism has entered a far more active stage. This is confirmed by the fact that today ideological confrontations have become very sharp. A variety of fast and very aggressive forms of confrontation with a broad social scope and even broader social response have developed. Naturally, our age has never shown any ideological conciliation or abatement of the ideological class struggle. However, the new aspect of today's situation is the drastically emphasized aggressive nature of different ideologies, as a result of which we note a profound ideologization of social behavior, class struggle and international life. There is no significant event today which is purely spontaneous or which is not backed by a more profound ideological motivation.

Consequently, today ideology, conceived as the product of social conflicts and as the instrument of their development and resolution, plays a substantially greater role. The ideological motivation which governs sociopolitical actions is an important component of contemporary social processes, and we would be unable to gain a complete understanding of what is taking place around us unless we are aware of the many-sided and aggressive nature of ideological forces and intentions in the contemporary world.

It would also be a major error to assume that the unparalleled aggravation of the ideological confrontation is a very temporary situation, for both our victories and the intensification of internal contradictions in the capitalist countries encourage imperialism, American imperialism above all, to hold back and restrict by force the development of revolutionary processes in the world and in real socialism, which is their main support. The objective of the entire overt and covert dynamics of U.S. official policy and ideology is to implement its model of planetary relations on the basis of military and political superiority. The ideological initiative of the new Washington administration, which is to gain for the United States political and moral leadership in the world and to impose on global public opinion the idea that America has some kind of special mission regarding the other countries in the world is neither politically nor ideologically accidental. Under the circumstances of the profound economic, social and political crisis, such global claims have the advantage, as Marxism proved in the 1930's, that for a while they can have an intoxicating effect on a large percentage of the masses. Thus, at the beginning of the 1980's, the militant bourgeois ideology clearly proved its intention of becoming more closely linked with mass feelings and of using for its class objectives some areas of social awareness which have been previously neglected. In its search for new directions along which to increase its influence and by using new means for expanding its influence, contemporary bourgeois ideology is trying to transfer the battle for the minds of the people to the broadest possible area of mass consciousness. Unquestionably, it is precisely there that it is seeking revenge for the historical defeats suffered by capitalism and is looking for a strong and aggressive alternative to communist ideas and accomplishments.

This takes us to another distinguishing feature of the present situation: we are the witnesses of and participants in the ideological struggle which involves the large masses of our contemporaries. When we speak of ideology today it is absurd to think only in terms of scholastic theories or ideological enthusiasms of groups of intellectuals or politicians or else limited party masses. The reason for which ideology plays such a considerable role in our time is its mass scope and the fact that it is the actual manifestation of and tool in the confrontation between large social and class forces.

This makes it incumbent upon us to engage in an even better theoretical and political discussion with the millions of followers of scientific socialism, to win over new millions of people among its supporters, to warn them of the danger threatening the world and the revolutionary gains of the working class, to mobilize them in the struggle and to inspire them with confidence in the future. I believe that it is precisely in this area that we can see the great opportunities which today's circumstances offer PROBLEMS OF PEACE AND SOCIALISM, which talks to its readers in 37 languages and is distributed in 145 countries.

The fact that real socialism will remain as the focal point of the ideological struggle, as the greatest accomplishment of the international communist and workers movements, is a major distinguishing feature of the situation in the 1980's. The entire concentrated ideological and propaganda indoctrination of the masses by imperialism is focused on proving that socialism and the notorious "Soviet military threat" are to be blamed for everything. Unquestionably, both today and tomorrow imperialism will continue to wage an ideological struggle against our countries and the international communist and workers movements with greatly intensified zeal, malice and class hatred. Unquestionably, the problems of real socialism, its nature, form, development stages and means for reaching it will be the common denominator always and everywhere. This is fully explainable, for it is precisely socialism which remains the latest and most important idea of our time. It is the slogan of the left-wing forces in the developed capitalist and developing countries; it is the main threat to traditional bourgeois "liberals" and extremist bourgeois "neo-conservatives," to sporadic neofascist forces and to all other reactionary forces today.

The new forms and specific means of struggle against real socialism to which our enemies will resort will become clear with time. It is already clear, however, that the main attack and differentiated approach are aimed at undermining the unity of the socialist countries and that their main objective is to transfer the center of the ideological struggle to the socialist countries.

Finally, another interesting characteristic of today's situation is that it is not only quite strongly colored but considerably complicated by the energizing of ideologies which have a more limited, a medium-range radius of action, so to speak.

Strange as it seems, the various religious doctrines became energized in the 1970's and the beginning of the 1980's--a period of most tempestuous scientific and technical progress. At the same time, an interest has been revived in the ideas of Rousseau and Buffon regarding the "natural condition" of man. An increasing number of publications are promoting one or another kind of scientific superstition, actively supported essentially by young people, who are looking for an ideological alternative to the contemporary capitalist society. A noticeable interest is being shown in some ideas and schools of thought considered obsolete and "unfashionable."

Still in this respect, let us note the increased role which some new movements which display their own ideologies are playing in contemporary development, ideologies which are outside and independent of ours and which, alarmingly, occasionally clash with our ideology. Iran has provided us with the most typical example of this: the role which Islam plays as the ideological banner of the Iranian revolution is unquestionable.

Consequently, our task for the 1980's will be to pay greater attention to these and other basic ideological manifestations which will form the ideological content of the forthcoming period and to study them more profoundly and comprehensively in order to formulate a proper ideological strategy and our tasks under the new circumstances.

These are the questions which our delegation would like to formulate at this conference.

I express the confidence of the BCP, Aleksandur Lilov said, that PROBLEMS OF PEACE AND SOCIALISM will continue to fulfill successfully its quite difficult and complex but very necessary service to the international communist movement.

SLOVENIAN COMMENT ON POLISH MARTIAL LAW SITUATION

Ljubljana DELO in Slovenian 19 Dec 81 p 1

[Article by Marjan Sedmak: "Shots in Katowice"]

[Text] The Polish military, which seized power on Sunday morning, accompanied this entry into the arena of history with signs whose national symbols and patriotism the sensitive Polish people cannot overlook. As General Wojciech Jaruzelski raised the national flag above the headquarters of the Central Committee of the Polish United Workers Party, this was symbolic--symbolic with an important message--and also supported by words: at the moment in which the armed forces suspended the process of confrontational democracy and of the political resolution of the crisis, the army represented national unity whose basic driving force was patriotism and independence and Polish integrity. Along with force which will not permit Poland to return to the situation prior to August 1980.

But the road to hell is--obviously, this time, too--paved with good intentions. The military intervention aggravated that fundamental conflict which permeates Polish society, the conflict between the party-state monopoly of power on the one hand and the ambitions of the working class to have control of its fate, on the other hand. The very introduction of martial law which suppressed democratic confrontation and consistently asserted its authority is a return to the old situation. The inexorable character of brute force was demonstrated on Wednesday when seven Katowice miners fell under the fire of the security troops. The militarization of socialism obviously cannot avoid strong arm tactics, turned against its own working class.

The question of who--challenged or not--pulled the trigger is not important. In Katowice they were shot in the name of the military council and the Polish armed forces, which for Poles henceforth will no longer be what they have been. And were they not shot as a sign of a certain insensitive dogmatism which does not know how to and, above all, does not want to, bridge the gap between itself and its own working class?

BRIEFS

CZECH HARVEST RESULTS--According to Czech Deputy Minister of Agriculture and Food O. Vanek, this year's plan of the overall agricultural production will be fulfilled by 95 percent only. The only production plans fulfilled were those of winter rape, hops and potatoes. In the Czech lands the average per-hectare-yield of cereals was 3.58 tons--0.46 tons less than last year. The sugar beet growers delivered 14 percent less sugar beets than the plan envisaged. The hops growers, however, exceeded their production plan by 5 percent, and the quality of this year's hops is "very good." More than 65 percent of the procured hops was classified as being of the first and second quality, and its price will be about KC$80,000 per ton. [Prague ZEMEDELSKE NOVINY in Czech 18 Dec 81 p 1]

SUGAR CAMPAIGN IN SLOVAKIA--The sugar campaign in Slovakia is in its closing stage. The Slovak sugar refineries have processed 1.69 million tons of sugar beets until now, with 180,000 tons still to be processed. [Bratislava PRAVDA in Slovak 17 Dec 81 p 2]

ARABLE LAND IN SLOVAKIA--Between 1970 and 1980, the area of arable land in Slovania shrank from 1,682,762 hectares to 1,516,198 hectares. In the west Slovak region, the area of arable land shrank by 2,777 hectares and another 8,192 hectares were put at the disposal of the city of Bratislava. In the central Slovak region the arable land decreased by 81,636 hectares and in the east Slovak region by 82,151 hectares. [Bratislava ROLNICKE NOVINY in Slovak 17 Dec 81 p 3]

TRADE CONTRACTS WITH MOZAMBIQUE--An economic delegation led by Mozambique's Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade Jose Dias Marques paid a visit to the CSSR on 4-9 December. The delegation conducted talks on the further development of mutual economic cooperation with Jaroslav Jakubec, CSSR deputy minister of foreign trade. Representatives of the CSSR and Mozambican foreign trade organizations signed contracts valued at KC$20 million during the visit. [Prague RUDE PRAVO in Czech 11 Dec 81 p 2]

AGRICULTURAL LAND--According to Jan Roubal, deputy chairman of the CSSR People's Control Committee, in the CSSR there are at present 6,871,000 hectares of agricultural land. This figure includes 106,000 hectares which are not tilled--they have to be ameliorated [rekultivovane]--and more than 20,000 hectares of land temporarily not tilled because of construction work or extraction of raw materials. In the past 10 years, agricultural land shrunk by about 241,000 hectares. [Prague PRACE in Czech 11 Nov 81 p 3]

CONTROVERSIAL GDR, FRG WRITERS' MEETING IN EAST BERLIN DISCUSSED

Swiss Commentary

Zurich NEUE ZUERCHER ZEITUNG in German 18 Dec 81 p 5

/Report by 'R.M.,' datelined Berlin, 15 December: "An Unusual Peace Discussion in East Berlin—Candid Words at a West-East Writers Meeting"/

/Text/ "If Schmidt and Honecker are able to get together, we should also be able to do so," said one of the participants in the peace discussion between writers and scientists from East and West held on Sunday and Monday (13-14 December) at an East Berlin hotel. This event, at least, was no less unusual than the Schmidt-Honecker summit meeting in snowy Schorfheide on Lake Werbellin. At any rate, it is highly unlikely that such open and critical statements on the peace issue as were made by a variety of speakers at the Hotel Stadt Berlin in front of media representatives of East and West had ever been heard at a GDR function before. The meeting was even more unusual in the sense that a number of writers were permitted to take part who had either been expelled from the official writers union—like Stefan Hermlin and Rolf Schneider—or were among the many artists and authors who left the GDR involuntarily in recent years—like Jurek Becker and Thomas Brasch.

An Inner-German Affair

The man who had issued the invitations was lyric poet Stefan Hermlin, who escaped from the Nazis and spent some time in Switzerland during the war and who, after settling in East Berlin in 1947, became one of the GDR's most respected writers. He is considered a multi-faceted personality, liberal by GDR standards and, despite intermittent differences with the regime, a loyal supporter of it and a man with personal connections to SED chief Honecker. East Berlin insiders have no doubt but that this particular connection was a decisive factor in Hermlin's being able to push through his initiative for an East-West writers debate which appears to have run into major difficulties with the party bureaucracy at the outset.

In the West, Hermlin's invitations to the peace discussion encountered understandable skepticism. Robert Jungk voiced this skepticism at the very beginning of the discussion when he said that he and some of his Western colleagues were wondering whether this event would not be abused for political purposes. Doubts of this sort, it seems, were at least one reason why only some 20 writers and 10 scientists from the West attended the East Berlin roundtable composed of some 90 participants. For that matter, the East-West forum was an inner-German affair as to its makeup. The GDR was represented by its entire phalanx of prominent writers; on the Western side, the best known participants were Guenter Grass, Heinar Kipphardt, Carl Amery, Luise Rinser and Peter Schneider. Switzerland was represented by Adolf Muschg and Austria by Ernst Jandl.

There was more than enough Eastern-style peace rhetoric to be heard in the course of the 1½-day meeting. Above all it came from the ancient party-line professors from the East Berlin academy of sciences and several guests from the USSR who repeated their sterile statements over and over again about the supposedly lily-white desire for peace by the Kremlin leadership and its utter blamelessness for the arms race. The blame for the constantly growing nuclear arms arsenals, their argument ran, and for all other evils in the world must be laid at the door of the capitalist system exclusively with its profit motive and above all at the door of the Reagan administration which was said to be coolly planning the atomic annihilation of Europe.

Grass on "Unloved Giants"

Although a majority of the speakers did spout this type of propaganda in a variety of more or less unimaginative ways, there was no lack of clear response to it—not only from Western participants. Guenter Grass was the first speaker to protest against this simplistic method of assigning guilt. His fear of nuclear annihilation, he said, was not restricted to the plans for stationing new American medium-range missiles in Western Europe but was determined equally by the Soviet SS-20's already in place. Grass accused the politicians of the East and the West of having failed because they have built up such vast potentials for destruction in the name of securing peace through deterrence which now threaten to get out of control. He called the USSR and the U.S. "two unloved giants, who want to be loved and who occasionally force their love upon us." Interestingly enough, only a handful of Eastern dogmatics took exception with this attempt at equating the two superpowers morally and politically. Most Western participants, at least, seemed ready to accept this dubious contention either tacitly or explicitly as a kind of axiom—not infrequently with a European type of arrogance.

Stefan Heym, who served in the American Army during the war, who settled in the GDR in the fifties and was expelled from the writers union 2 years ago, brought the peace discussion back to reality whenever it strayed into abtractions. He asked whether this forum could ignore the fact that just a few kilometers further east the fuze of a possible nuclear inferno might already be burning ? Once before, a world war broke out over Poland. Furthermore, one should take note of the fact that wars of intervention no longer are the monopoly of any one side. The Zurich writer Adolf Muschg also addressed the Polish problem directly. He asked for—vainly, as it turned out—concrete answers to the question why the freedom to establish unions and the freedom of assembly fought for in this socialist country was being rescinded once more. Muschg warned the Eastern participants not to view the peace movement in the West solely in terms of anti-nuclear missile protest. The fact is, he said, the movement calls for an alternative quality of life generally, for protest against the destruction of nature and against production euphoria which is being actively promoted under socialism particularly. But if an intervention in Poland did take place, the peace movement in the West would surely "go down the drain."

Critics of the GDR from the GDR

The two GDR authors de Bruyn and Rolf Schneider criticized the SED regime for crowing about the peace movement and the pacifists in the West and at the same time repressing similar tendencies in their own country. Like several other speakers from East and West, de Bruyn called for permission to establish an independent peace movement in the GDR free from government interference and the establishment of civilian service for conscientious objectors such as exists in the FRG. Rolf Schneider called attention to the progressive militarization of education, to the support for war games and obligatory instruction in military affairs.

In order to break out of the vicious circle of the arms race, FRG writer Peter Schneider suggested the two German states should send out a first signal of hope by both disarming unilaterally. Interestingly, official host Stefan Hermlin also voiced guarded sympathy for pacifist ideas in contrast to the majority of the orthodox GDR participants. The slogan "make peace without weapons," he said, may sound utopian but does have a "realistic core" in an age of absolute arsenals of annihilation. At any rate, one could not simply brush aside the call by many people for unilateral disarmament. To support this thesis, he cited—for whatever reason—a letter by Lenin to a reader of the JOURNAL DE GENEVE, which was published for the first time just recently. Still, Hermlin also pointed out that Lenin who, as is well known, would have nothing to do with pacifism in his own empire had expressed different views on this subject as well.

Selective Coverage by East Berlin

The GDR media, as was to be expected, have given prominent but very selective and completely watered-down coverage to the 2-day writers forum in East Berlin. The newspapers make mention of the party-line statements almost exclusively while disregarding those statements and demands which are unfavorable to the regime. But a large part of the population will nonetheless be able to see and hear these very things on Western TV. Whatever aims this unusual event might originally have pursued, it might have consequences in the GDR which hardly correspond to Honecker's interests.

The discussion begun in East Berlin is to be continued at a new gathering in a Western city. Perhaps it will be possible at subsequent meetings of this sort to work on and to expand on this or that unconventional peace theory which may have been spawned at the East Berlin forum the ideological differences to the contrary notwithstanding.

[Article by ND correspondents: "Banish the Threat of War Through United Forces—Arguments and Opinions at the 'Berlin Meeting for Promotion of Peace'"]

[Text] Paraphrasing Heinrich Heine's "Germany—A Winter's Tale," GDR author Jurij Brezan said that hundreds of thousands of people were robbed of their sleep today as he opened the "Berlin Meeting for the Promotion of Peace" on Monday. People were aware, he said, of the U.S. government's strategic scenarios in which Europe figured as an atomic battleground. "To keep this from happening with the help of the arts, the sciences and the will of millions to live," Brezan said, "seems to me to be the primary, the most important, in fact the only way that offers promise of success."

Most Urgent Task Is to Safeguard Peace

The Second World War has left a deep imprint on his generation, Soviet writer Daniil Granin said. Today's armaments were a heritage of that war, he said, and the fight for peace today was above all the fight for disarmament. It was no accident that the recent peace demonstrations in Western Europe were primarily directed against the aggressive policies of the United States. They were indicative of the sure instinct of millions of people as to where the real dangers lie which threaten peace today.

Physicist Dr Karl Lanius (GDR) referred to the previous day's call for informing the public about the dangers and threats posed by excessive armaments. He pointed out that the new medium-range missiles as well as the neutron bomb are a clear technical indication that U.S. military planners consider a nuclear war both possible to wage and to win.

So as to identify those responsible for the arms race, Erik Neutsch (GDR) put the question as to who said there were more important things than peace—it was Haig, was it not ?

Konrad Wolf, the president of the GDR academy of fine arts, said that he met many Soviet people during the war and experienced their love and desire for peace. Yevtushenko's poen "Do You Believe the Russians Want War ?" was addressed to those, he said, who have forgotten that the USSR suffered most from World War II.

Along with a number of other participants, author Carl Amery (FRG) came out in favor of a nuclear-free zone in Europe from Poland to Portugal. Referring back to Jurij Brezan's remarks, Amery said the Europeans should not play the role of slaves and gladiators submitting to U.S. military strategy but should make their own specific contribution to disarmament. FRG writer Dieter Lattmann recalled the peace message Leonid Brezhnev recently enunciated on his visit to Bonn.

The need to take an active part in safeguarding turned out to be the main theme of the discussion although there were different points of view expressed on how a secure peace and disarmament are to be achieved.

USSR Disarmament Proposals Not to Be Rejected

Prof Dr Daniil Proektor from Moscow objected to equating the USSR and the U.S. in speaking of a threat to peace. The main goal of USSR policy is not the arms race, he said, but the constant elevation of people's standard of living. For this, we must have peace. The policy of the USSR is based on the assumption that no political issue admits of a military solution in this day and age.

Law professor Axel Azzola (FRG) presented a brief on legal disarmament in the FRG, coming out against all aspects of the sole representation claim vis-a-vis the GDR.

FRG dramatist Heinar Kipphardt said it was necessary not only to ban nuclear weapons but war itself as a political instrument. There were already 5,000 nuclear warheads being stored on FRG soil, he said; but apparently that is not enough for the Americans because they want to introduce Pershing-II missiles and the neutron bomb on top of that.

Prof Dr Heinz Kamnitzer from the GDR gave his emphatic support to the European writers' appeal which brings a great many creative personalities together on a common platform in their efforts to achieve peace and disarmament. The point is to achieve optimal, general disarmament which is to the advantage of all and the disadvantage of none.

Stage director Manfred Wekwerth (GDR) said it was imperative to take up viable and realistic proposals. The Soviet Union, he said, has been issuing impassioned appeals for safeguarding peace, against the arms race and for negotiations for some time. He also recalled the proposal to declare a moratorium on deployment of medium-range missiles, the gesture of withdrawing 20,000 Soviet troops and 1,000 tanks from the GDR and the initiatives aiming at a nuclear-free zone in Europe and in northern Europe.

No Deployment of U.S. Nuclear Missiles

Manfred Wekwerth continued by saying that history will have lots of time to pass judgment on the social orders of the two German states but that there is much less time to guarantee the survival of the two because of the danger of war. But there is a better chance of survival, if the deployment of new nuclear missiles in the FRG can be averted.

Prof Dr Friedrich Jung (GDR) discussed the question of whether it is true to say that no politician can be trusted on the issue of peace. As for himself, he said, he looked upon the statesmen of his own country as tried and true representatives of peace. He was very pleased to hear Erich Honecker come out so clearly and in complete agreement with the interests and hopes of the GDR's population on Lake Werbellin when he declared the preservation and safeguarding of the peace as the basic GDR position in the struggle for peace.

The question raised by various participants as to who threatens whom was answered by Prof Dr Gerhard Kade (FRG) who pointed out that the arms race has been heated up time and again by the U.S. ever since the first atom bomb was dropped in 1945. Qualitative and quantitative rearmament was always accompanied by ever new lies regarding a threat posed by the Soviet Union. The first-strike strategy, evolved in the early seventies, he said, was aimed at eroding nuclear parity. One should not be speaking of war guilt as in the past but would have to speak of a guilt connected with preparing for war.

GDR author Benito Wogatzki said the "Berlin Meeting" was a kind of test to see whether it is at all possible to talk to each other, given the many different views. What was achieved is a start at best, he said. A lot remains still to be done.

DEPUTY INTERIOR MINISTER DISCUSSES COUNTERINTELLIGENCE EFFORT

Warsaw WOJSKO LUDOWE in Polish No 10, Oct 81 pp 8-12

[Article by Brigadier General Wladyslaw Pozoga, deputy minister of internal affairs: "We Will Defend Socialist Poland"]

[Text] In October we will be celebrating the holiday that honors the Polish Armed Forces and also the holiday honoring the Citizens Militia and the Security Service. There is something deeply symbolic in this. A common heritage, common goals, brotherhood sealed in the shedding of blood, and the toil of constant vigilance. And they share the same most sublime duty--to work together in service of the socialist Homeland.

Both of these holidays are preceded by the anniversary of the Polish September [September 1939]. It is almost as if the former two holidays were an outgrowth of the latter. "The defensive war of 1939, the heroism of the Polish soldier is a proud chapter in our history, and it is right that we should pay tribute to this. It is also a historical lesson. What this lesson teaches us in essence is that we should never again permit ourselves to be weak, defenseless, and isolated. This lesson is just as important today as it ever was. In an unstable and dangerous world NATO militarist circles are building up their military infrastructure and are working actively to enhance their air power," said army general Wojciech Jaruzelski, chairman of the Council of Ministers and minister of national defense, in a speech delivered during the graduation ceremonies of the Higher Officers School of Antiaircraft Defense Troops in Koszalin on the eve of the 42d anniversary of the Hiterite invasion of Poland.

I belong to that generation of Poles who will never be able to forget the experiences of that September and to that group of Polish citizens for whom the experiences of those days and what happened after September has determined their role in society and dictated that they should pursue certain lines of work. The things that were experienced and felt by my generation were perhaps expressed most beautifully and most faitfully as well as so very concisely by Wladyslaw Broniewski in his poem "September Sun:"

". . . . I will look up into the sky and it will hurt, there will be no joy under the September sun.
This sun has risen above the horizon,
conferring its blessings on the enemy planes, this sun routed us with an ironclad front, the guns did it with their roar, the tanks with their menacing rumble.

. . . . the armies were coming, faster than the Polish infantryman, the bombs blew up the train stations,
the hastily abandoned towns were in flames, the Germans were coming . . . ."

"It is therefore necessary," said army general Wojciech Jaruzelski on 30 September 1981 in a comment addressed to young officers responsible for defending our skies, "to keep an ever vigilant eye trained on the sky, not to let ourselves be taken by surprise, and be equal to every combat situation."

Important anniversaries always incline us to stop and think about things, to remember, to reflect. They move us to take stock of things, to sum up what we have gained and what we have lost. Balance sheets always have a cost column. Everyone is pretty much aware of what we have gained. But the costs are unknown or forgotten. We doublecheck our findings, analyze the present situation, and try to predict the shape of things to come. We try to define our role and the work we will have to do in order to fulfill this role.

Not just for professional reasons, but also for emotional reasons I very often take time to look at documents, studies, reports, and memoirs dealing with the events of September. The memoirs of commanders and ordinary soldiers, politicians, scholars, and ordinary people. I read studies and documents dealing with the activities of the Abwehr and other Hitlerite special services which carried out missions on Polish soil that were dedicated to serving the expansionist and vindictive policy goals of the Third Reich.

Running through all of this memorial literature and welling up from the nethermost regions of human life and experience there is a note of sorrow and bitterness that is a product of hopelessness and helplessness. The helplessness of regular army units, the civil administrative authorities, and the residents of our countryside in the face of German intelligence and the fifth column. "The atmosphere of helplessness was intensified by the operations of German air power and armor as well as by the efficiency and flawless organization of the sabotage operations that were taking place on a scale and in a form that was a complete surprise to the higher ranking commanders of that day" (Brigadier general Ksawery Floryanowicz). "Unfortunately, the fifth column disrupted the defense by engaging in widespread sabotage" (Tadeusz Radwanski). "Keeping track of the comings and goings of the commanders and staff officers of the newly organized command in Bielsko posed no problems for the Germans living in this town . . . They were of course constantly going through our things which we left behind in the hotel. One day I noticed that somebody had been exceptionally careless by leaving my suitcase in a special mess. On another day, during lunch, a general discovered splinters of glass in his pea soup, but, fortunately, he spotted the glass before he ate any of the soup (division general Jozef Kuropieska).

"I kept running into more and more signs of the destructive work being done by German saboteurs. Telephone lines were being cut, telephone and post offices were being destroyed . . . . Yes, this was all their dirty work! And, at the same time, German sabotage operations were becoming more and more noticeable in the rear areas of the 'Pomeranian' army. Some of these saboteurs were even recruited from among the ranks of the reserve officers and enlisted men of the Polish Army. Their destructive activities were beginning to take on extremely diverse forms. Dressed in Polish uniforms, they scceeded in imparting false information to the commanders of retreating units. The same story which I had witnessed a couple of days earlier in Pomerania was repeating itself. Unfortunately, there was nothing that could be done to effectively prevent this . . . . In one line of troops there turned up eight young Germans. They all had Polish uniforms and Polish identification papers, and they spoke good Polish. Lying next to them were stolen weapons and a radio transceiver" (Stanislaw Slawinski).

Things like this were happening not just along roads of retreat being travelled by the "Pomeranian," "Poznan," and "Lodz" armies. These things were happening wherever a heroic defense was being put up against the barbarian invaders of our country, wherever, to quote division general Tadeusz Kutrzeby, "a soldier of the Republic was trying to perform the impossible duty, in 1939, of defending Poland."

So, this is why memories of September will always be linked in my mind with our October celebrations. This mental association is cemented by all of the things that our nation has gone through, running the gamut from Gliwice provocation and the intelligence preparations for the Hitlerite aggression that preceded it, the atrocities committed by firing squads, the Gestapo's underground dungeons and concentration camps, through the Wehrwolf and UPA [Ukrainian Revolutionary Army] bands that roamed the country after the liberation, the Gehlen and later on the BND [Bundesnachrichtsdienst--FRG intelligence service] spy rings and today's NATO intelligence services.

Our social and political system was formed in the heat of a pitched battle. Hostile class forces had not withdrawn from the battlefield. It was necessary to fight for the realization of the new social ideals proclaimed by the program of the Polish Workers Party and by the July Manifesto of the Polish National Liberation Committee and for the enactment of reforms. And these battles had to be fought at a time when Hitlerite fascism still had not been crushed, at a time when the occupying forces were ruthlessly trying to achieve their ambition of bringing about the destruction of the Polish nation throughout most of our national territory. These battles were being fought by a new and still evolving governmental apparatus with a new class profile, a government that was totally unlike any of its predecessors. One of the instruments used in this struggle that was created at the very dawn of People's Poland was the public security service apparatus. To a large extent, it bore the brunt of this fight, and it had the duty of launching a counter-offensive against enemy positions and protecting security, law and order. It also had to make the greatest sacrifices.

It seems as though things have really reached the point now where we should start talking about this apparatus as it deserves to be talked about. That is, without resorting to demagoguery, coy phrases, or broad generalizations. We need to tell the truth, the truth that was and the truth that is. Right now is the time to speak the truth, since the wave of unwarranted attacks unleashed many months ago against this apparatus, attacks which are assuming ever newer forms, and the outright offensive that is being instigated and ceaselessly abetted by forces hostile to Poland and socialism, a campaign that was provoked by anarchist, criminal, and hooligan elements, show no signs of letting up, rather they are intensifying. At a time when highly refined forms of harassment, provocation, desecration, and other forms of pressure are being applied against security service and Citizens Militia officers and their families--mothers, wives, and children--as well as against monuments commemorating their courage. The aim of all this clear--to split the ranks of the security apparatus, to bring about its psychological demobilization and total paralysis.

Can anyone be surprised by this, when we know who is behind this and what they are trying to accomplish. Who is it that trying to egg on and exploit the renewal process and to what purpose? Are the Bandera-ite "striltsy" [reference to Ukrainian nationalist fighters active during World War II and led by Stepan Bandera] starting to raise their voices? Acting on behalf of Solidarity, is one of the bloodthirsty NEZ [enezetowski; expansion of acronym or meaning of reference unknown] ringleaders going to take over the office of the Ministry of National Defense representative in one of our largest workplaces during a strike, and are others going to start keeping white and colored books [another historical reference; meaning unclear], dossiers on "troublemakers?" We know what they did with these books years ago. We know what kinds of atrocities they committed. It is thanks only to the magnanimity of people's power and the amnesty which it granted that these people's lives were spared.

So, what kind of people are we? Where did we come from to join this apparatus? The fact of the matter is that we emerged from the ranks of the people's Polish Army and from the underground guerilla army. We came here from farmhand barracks and from out of the blast furnaces of iron and steelworks. This is our heritage and to this day this remains our class profile. Our ideological outlook on the world was shaped by the party. It is our nature to fight. And to work responsibly in service of the Homeland.

Take a look at our Obituary Chronicle. Thousands of our colleagues have fallen in the line of duty in open battles with gangs, from being hit by snipers' bullets, and in obscure skirmishes with intelligence agents. Both officers and enlisted men have lost their lives. Couriers working for small security offices and their chiefs. Young people, some very young people who never even had a chance to find out what life is all about, and hardened veterans of battles fought for the sake of a free and independent Poland, defenders of the Spanish Republic and--soldiers who saw action during the Polish September. Women paid with their lives too. Women officers, women who were mothers and wives. And their children also paid with their lives.

Here is a telling document dating back to 1951. The foreign intelligence agent Czaykowski, writing from Krakow to his headquarters about the "Forest Unit" operating in the Baba Gora area, goes into raptures over its methods. He emphasizes that "this unit is notorious for its elite character and atrocities," and he regards this as the "secret of its success." He describes one such method used by a gang which tied an Internal Security Corps soldier to a tree in the middle of a huge anthill. He concludes with the observation: "the guy was gagged real tight and he died from the pain, because the ants chewed up his legs right down to the bone." Later on in this report we read about how in the village of Dkomielna Czarna in Myslenice powiat "a group of people drove up in broad daylight in an elegant limousine from out of the woods and murdered Surowka, a respected worker and party activist . . . ."

We would do well to recall that during the first few postwar years alone security service officers rounded up: 276 collaborators with the Hitlerite intelligence service, 2,678 officers and agents of the Gestapo, 16,000 members of the SS, SA [Sturmabteilung], and NSDAP [Nazi Party]. It was not until then that many of these people received justly deserved punishment for their bandit-like and nefarious deeds. However, some of them managed to postpone this moment of truth. "Bruno," the Sicherheitsdienst [Nazi intelligence service] resident in Poznan, who later on did work in the Ukraine, found refuge in a false name and beneath a doctor's smock until the 1950's, and it was only that he gave himself away by trying to establish contact with the Gehlen organization. Viktoras Galvanauskas, an agent of bourgeois Lithuania's military intelligence service and later of the Gestapo, murderer of several thousand people and member of the Wilno Sonderkommando unit, was not unmasked until just a couple of years ago. Many members of the Hitlerite intelligence service and the Gestapo have been unmasked thanks to our collaboration with the security agencies of the fraternal socialist countries.

With the onset of the cold war, with the help of its imperialist allies, the German intelligence hydra was resurrected in the form of the Gehlen organization, which later transformed into the West German intelligence service (the BND)--an intelligence service that is much more numerous than that of the Third Reich and is equipped with far superior assets. Together with the Bundeswehr, this is the principal, and as ever anti-Polish, military intelligence force of the aggressive NATO pact. We are constantly being served with reminders of this aggressiveness, among other ways, on the basis of its intelligence collection interests and operations.

Along the borders of the socialist countries and in various parts of the world the headquarters of hostile intelligence services have set up centers and field stations dedicated to the recruitment, training, and dispatch into our countries of spies and saboterus. In the old days this kind of activity was characterized by the setting up of spy rings made up of a dozen or so or sometimes even several scores of agents. As a rule, these spy rings were established by people who made their way into Poland from abroad by illegal means, i.e., through defections, in submarines, aircraft, and ballons, people who were prepared to wage a merciless struggle, people who were equipped with the weapons, the latest material-technical devices and money, and, usually, poison. Their missions included, among other things, fanning the already dying flames of the civil war, in addition to engaging in subversion and sabotage. Many of these people were recruited from among the ranks of former members of the OUN [Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists] and fascist UPA bands.

The aggressive actions taken by Polish counterintelligence, which consisted of penetrations of adversary operations and the disruption of their programs, the increasingly more refined planning of our own operations, the enormous dedication of our officers, and, first and foremost, the vigilance and assistance of the general public laid a favorable groundwork for effectively thwarting and foiling the plans of hostile forces. In one year alone (1953) 336 agents of imperialist intelligence services were arrested and 17 large spy rings were broken up. In West Berlin alone during those years more than 90 intelligence organizations, hundreds of meeting sites, and thousands of agents hostile to Poland were exposed. Nor was there any letup in their activities in later years, during the era of detente. The only changes were in the forms and tactics of these activities. The forms and tactics of these activities were coopted to an ever greater degree by centers engaged in psychological warfare and ideological subversion, by the military-industrial complex, and by the most reactionary forces in the West. So, after the "Polish October" and the well-known events which followed in its wake, over a span of only 15 months (from January 1958 to March 1959) the Security Service apparatus arrested more than 50 spies working for various intelligence centers operating out of West Berlin and the FRG.

The constant upsurge in espionage activity and, at the same tim,, the effective measures taken by our counterintelligence services to put a stop to this activity is attested to by the fact that 166 spies have been exposed and arrested over the past 9 years. Some of them did not have enough time to carry out the missions to which they were assigned by their principals and still had not developed a full-fledged program of espionage activity in keeping with the instructions they had received, since they were exposed and arrested before they had a chance to do so. Many, unfortunately, did manage over a rather long period of time to actively pursue this kind of activity in exchange for "Judas' silver."

Counterintelligence programs are always highly involved, and in recent years, in view of the complicated political situation, it has also become much more difficult to pursue these programs. In order to take action along these lines, in addition to possessing a great deal of experience, it is also necessary to constantly analyze the facts and to display great discretion and boldness when making decisions in a given case. The success of counterintelligence programs is contingent upon the by now traditional and always exemplary and, nowadays, exceptionally close collaboration of the appropriate services of the Ministry of Internal Affairs and the Ministry of National Defense as well as upon the understanding and support of the general public.

One of the important factors that has been hampering counterintelligence programs of late is the considerable lack of confidence, an attitude that--as I mentioned--is often inspired by certain forces in addition to being a product of ignorance of the facts, on the part of many people in government agencies, including in particular the Security Service. This is because over the past 10 years the activities of hostile intelligence services and, in this context, the role of the Security Service have been taboo subjects. Nothing has been written nor has there been any talk about these issues in the mass media. To the extent that anything at all has been published on this subject--apart from internal use only publications --, it has been confined to a dry and terse communique on the unmasking of a spy by the Security Service, the institution of legal proceedings, or the handing down of a sentence by a military court. This has been the sum total of the information that has been made available to public opinion. The fact of the matter is, quite naturally, that no counterintelligence service in the world stands to gain anything from tipping its own hand. However, I am proceeding from the basic assumption that effective counterintelligence work on behalf of our Homeland can only be a product of a highly developed and conscious display of activism on the part of the public at large. Familiarizing the public with some of the methods and interests of the NATO special services in our country is not only of prophylactic importance, rather it might also help to foster a public awareness of these problems and proper civic attitudes. This is attested to, among other things, by public reaction to Witold Rutkiewicz's film entitled "A Diary of Treason" (about the case of Leszek Chrost who was sentenced lsst year to 25 years in prison for espionage by the Court of the Warsaw Military District) and broadcast over television on 11 June 1981.

To the extent that we are able to do so, this is the kind of approach which we are trying to encourage on an increasingly larger scale, especially right now at a time when hostile special services and centers of subversion, resorting to the use of various ways and means, are stepping up their espionage activities directed against Poland.

One is bound to ask the question: who are these people who decide to betray their Homeland? What kinds of people make successful recruits for intelligence services? In the vast majority of cases these are young people. Many of them finished their university studies in People's Poland and have achieved professional and social positions of high standing. Most of them have had opportunities for upward social and professional mobility. These people were well off and, for the most part, enjoyed high standards of living and real prospects for systematically raising their living standards, among other ways as a result of frequent business trips abroad. They started to cooperate with hostile special services out of base motives, chiefly out of the desire to make money and get rich quick at all costs. After conducting preliminary studies of these prospective agents and learning something about their personality traits, the intelligence services would win them over in most cases by employing the so-called step-by-step method. They gradually maneuver these people into a dependent relationship and then draw them into a cooperative relationship.

Here are some examples. The aforementioned Leszek Chrost, born in 1932, university educated, a veteran foreign trade official, and most recently deputy director of the department for foreign trade and cooperation with foreign countries in the Ministry of the Heavy and Agricultural Machinery Industry, was recruited while serving with a trading agency in Bangkok; Stanislaw Dembowski, born in 1928, university educated, former minister plenopotentiary of the PPR serving with the MK NIK [expansion unknown] in Laos, and most recently senior advisor in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, was recruited in Laos; Leon Celegrat, born in 1937, professionally educated, career NCO in the Polish Armed Forces, and Andrzej Badowski, born in 1951, professionally educated, career NCO in the Polish Armed Forces,--both recruited by the American intelligence service in Vietnam; Henryk Trybek, born in 1924, university educated, management official in industry; Marian Blotny, born in 1924, university and technical school graduate, an employee of the General Walter Machine Building Works in Radom; Zenon Suchojad, born in 1947, secondary school graduate, staff employee of a political apparatus--all recruited while on tours of duty abroad; Anatol Szulski, born in 1927, university graduate, staff member of the Mining Institute in Katowice--recruited by an intelligence officer in Poland and abroad.

One might also mention a person who was arrested just this year, i.e., Bohdan Walewski, born in 1933, university graduate, veteran official in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, most recently a section chief in the same ministry, recruited by the U.S. intelligence service while serving in a foreign post.

The arrested agents were employed in central governmental agencies or in institutions or enterprises of critical importance to the nation. By virtue of the positions which they occupied they had access to important information and documents, which they proceeded to hand over to hostile intelligence services. For example, in one of the last espionage assignments given to Chrost--assignments spelled out in a list of intelligence requirements which we intercepted--the following questions were asked:

"12. What was the rate of inflation in Poland in 1977? How can the rate of inflation be compared with increases in worker wages?

13. What percentage of the national income is earmarked for the repayment of foreign debts?

14. What kinds of personnel changes are expected to take place in the PZPR?

15. What is the current thinking of the PZPR leadership about the dissident movement?

16. Please provide us with a description of the agenda of the recent meeting held in Budapest (from 27 February to 1 March) on ideological issues. What problems were discussed and how were they resolved?

17. Have you heard anything at all about the state of Cardinal Wyszynski's health? Who would the party like to see as his eventual successor?

18. Do you have any information about the volume of grain that Poland is supposed to receive from the Soviet Union and the other East European countries over the course of this year or further into the future?

19. If Poland does not receive any grain this year from the Soviets: what effect will this have on livestock herds and meat production? What impact will this have on living standards? Might this tend to encourage the possible outbreak of civil disturbances?

20. Please comment on the level of supplies of consumer goods and foodstuffs in the marketplace. What implications does this level of supplies have for the regime and for the general population? How would you assess the current climate of public opinion?

21. Do you know anything at all about secret clauses appended to CEMA agreements: If so, please furnish details.

22. Does CEMA have any unknown committees established under the terms of such secret clauses? If so, please furnish details concerning their rolds, membership, and accomplishments.

23. Do you have any access to data on Polish oil imports or on the sharing of oil resources among CEMA members? What kinds of trends are in evidence in Soviet oil exports to the East European countries?"

This list of requirements, from which we have quoted the above passage verbatim, concludes with the following words: "In order to avoid confusion and save space please assign numbers to your responses that correspond to the numbering of the above questions. Looking forward to your responses, we would like to say that we very much appreciate your cooperation and send you our best regards. Your friends."

Most of the agents who were exposed and sentenced to long terms of imprisonment by military courts committed espionage crimes as a result of immoral behavior while living abroad, alcohol abuse, tendencies toward recklessness, running afoul of the laws of the country in which they were residing. These facts formed the basis for and was used as compromising evidence during the recruitment process.

I would like to stress that when all is said and done the munber of people who embark on the road of treason is not very large and disproportionate to the enormous efforts invested by hostile special services--and to the system which they have built up practically everywhere where our citizens travel, including neutral countries, a system based on surveillance, the use of various underhanded deceptive methods--ranging from the blandishments of supposed friendships to bribery and extortion, and the fielding of a whole army of informers and case officers. As the political sophistication of our citizens increases it becomes all the harder for hostile services to recruit them. The principal difficulty lies in the fact that our people are deeply patriotic and, in the wake of the painful lessons which history has not spared us, highly sensitive to the threat posed by foreign intelligence services and other forms of hostile activity.

Treason and espionage are soundly condemned as the most severe crimes, and we regard those who commit these crimes with abhorrence. This has been borne out by facts that have come to light in recent years, fact which reveal that agents are being sent to Poland recruited in third countries, and, in order to throw our counterintelligence off guard, it often turns out that these agents are citizens of neutral and so-called Third World countries.

At this point one might mention the case of M. P. Vaisha, an agent of the U.S. and FRG intelligence services who was convicted of espionage in 1978 by the Warsaw Military District Court. Vaisha is a citizen of one of the non-aligned countries and made frequent trips to Poland as a businessman and had dealings with various institutions at the national and local levels. As a result of his wide-ranging contacts with responsible officials of these institutions (as a consequence of his arrest, several of these officials, including, inter alia, Kazimierz Tyranski, were convicted of having accepted bribes in exchange for their support of the interests of a foreign firm, the betrayal of industrial and commercial secrets, and other offenses) and access to original documents he was in a favorable position to engage in intelligence gathering activities.

Some other foreign agents were captains of western merchant vessels, citizens the FRG: R. Albrecht, J. Wenzel, and I. Wagener (sentenced to 10 years in prison by the Pomeranina Military District Court) ho made frequent calls in our seaports where they carried out a wide range of espionage missions.

We are now faced with the fact that an openly interlocking relationship exists between the activities of imperialist centers of subversion and espionage and the activities of internal antisocialist forces. We are faced with the most serious threat to our socialist system and national security in the history of People's Poland. In view of the crisis situation in which the country now finds itself hostile intelligence services enjoy increased opportunities to effect penetrations, and this is accompanied by a simultaneous increase in the destructive impact of the activities of our political adversary which is making a consistent effort to implement its program dedicated to the takeover of political power, destroy the structure of the socialist state, promote anarchy and the psychosis of defeatism, and wage a campaign of psychological terror against go ernment officials, members of the social and political aktiv, and all patriotic and reasonable forces.

Within the context of the overall stragegy aimed against the socialist countries special attention is being focused on Poland. It is stated in one of NATO's policy documents that Poland has never been as important as it is now. Its location economic problems, its role in the Warsaw Pact and CEMA, and also its historical ties with western countries dictate that a systematic effort should be made to keep abreast of the changes and events taking place in this country.

The events that are now unfolding in Poland are regarded by the forces of imperialism as a unique opportunity to realize their long-range goals that tie in with the global ideological confrontation between East and West. This is primarily a question of the attempt to further weaken our country, destroy the unity and stability of the European socialist countries, and turn Poland into a model for counter-revolutionary transformations in these countries. The policy shift of imperialist forces toward confrontation with the countries of the socialist community is playing a critical role in encouraging an upsurge in hostile activities directed against Poland. The strategic goals of these forces and the tactics which they are employing with a view to the realization of these goals have been modified so as to conform to the unique conditions and situation that prevail in our country.

This is an especially conspicious feature ofthe strategic and tactical plans of the principal NATO countries, which are exploiting the current crisis in Poland not only in order to step up their intelligence collection efforts targeted against our national defense and economy, but first and foremost in order to gather intelligence on our domestic situation coupled with a simultaneous upsurge in subversion-propaganda campaigns. The guidelines and instructions issued to special services and centers of subversion call for the fulfillment of missions that are primarily dedicated to undermining the leading role of the party, sowing discord in socialist society, and turning society against its government.

With regard to the campaign that is being carried on the area of subversion and propaganda the known and documented objectives of the principal NATO countries include, inter alia, the following programs that are being carried out by the officially accredited diplomatic missions of these countries:
--promoting contacts between western trade unions, primarily those that support the policies of their governments as well as those that have been infiltrated by special services, and Solidarity;
--promoting contacts between Polish intellectuals and representatives of cultural institutions;
--strengthening contacts with Polish journalists, many of whom, in the judgement of our adversaries, might serve as important instruments for helping to deliver the West's propaganda message to our people, and these journalists will play an increasingly larger role in pace with the further development of the liberalization process.

The imperialist countries have assigned a special role to their special services which, by means of their intelligence collection methods, are striving to perpetuate the destabilization of our country, exerting an influence on the policies of antisocialist coalitions, also including the extremist wings of Solidarity. Both during the period preceding the outbreak of the crisis and now too we have been witnessing a marked upsurge in the activities of the special services representing the NATO countries, although by now we are faced with more than just this, that is, we are also witnessing a tendency to merge intelligence gathering activities with subversion and propaganda campaigns.

As far as intelligence collection activities are concerned, the main emphasis has been placed on economic issues, and the interest of these special services in our social and political situation boils down mainly to gathering information about and lending impetus to:
--situations and moods in worker and youth circles, including in particular university student circles;
--the activities of antisocialist groups, especially so in terms of their standing and influence within Solidarity and also in terms of the long-range policies of this union and the feasibility of giving the antisocialist opposition a controlling influence in the shaping of these policies.

A multifaceted program of intelligence-gathering and subversive activities is being stepped up by the intelligence residencies established in the diplomatic missions of capitalist countries. Taking advantage of their diplomatic status, intelligence officers have not only increased the frequency of their contacts and meetings with those people from areas of the country, institutions, and professional circles that are of interest to them, rather they are also engaged in the recruitment of Polish citizens for purposes of espionage as well as in the running of agents previously recruited abroad.

There has also been a significant increase in the espionage-related penetration of our country by the military attaches of the NATO embassies as well as by other foreigners, including a very large number of journalists, who make frequent trips to Poland for limited periods of time with this aim in mind. The activities of many of these journalists far exceed the normal bounds of journalistic interests, and as a result more than 100 of them have had to be expelled from the country. Military attaches have been equipped with advanced technical and electronic devices and, depending on the nature of the missions which they are to perform in the field, with personal gear such as disguises, rubber socks [?] and gloves, mini-radio sets, and so on. They are making a systematic effort to penetrate our country's entire defense system: border areas, lines of communication, military installations and facilities, and defense-related industrial plants. They are interested in the level of ideological commitment and morale and the professional standares of our armed forces, including in particular the career military personnel the status of military training programs, signs of increased combat readiness, integration within the framework the Warsaw Pact, and so on.

Taking advantage of the present situation, intelligence services are inspiring and assisting antisocialist elements to foment tensions in various segments of society and to promote counterrevolutionary processes and acts. Western imperialist circles are furnishing wide-ranging material and political assistance to dissident and extremist activists and groups (KSS, KOR, and KPN [Social Self-Defense Committee, Workers Defense Committee, and the Confederation for an Independent Poland]) who proclaim that they are ready to take over political power in Poland. This assistance is being manifested in the sending, through various semiofficial (as supposed gifts) and illegal channels, of funds, propaganda materials written and printed in the West, advanced printing equipment (the effects of which we are witnessing on the streets of our cities) and radio and television equipment.

There is even a growing tendency on the part of certain ambassadors of western capitalist countries to participate directly in meetings with representatives of Solidarity, including in particular representatives of its leadership bodies. There is an obvious political purpose behind all this, i.e., their aim is to enhance the legitimacy of Solidarity leaders as equal official partners of the representatives of the capitalist countries, to "harden" the positions they take in negotiations with the government, and in this way to somehow underscore the fact that a "parallel government" exists in this country. In some of the diplomatic missions of the capitalist countries in Warsaw special positions have been created for the purpose of maintaining continuous contacts with Solidarity, positions which are filled for the most part with intelligence officers.

The migratory movements of individuals across international borders, a phenomenon which has been exploited for years--and with special intensity of late--by special services, are a serious problem in terms of the threat to our country. This is above all a question of an intrinsically new development, namely, the wave of illegal economic emigration to the capitalist countries. This entails adverse repercussions for the prestige, interests (the exodus of young, educated, professionally experienced and necessary people, especially so in the case of members of the technical intelligentsia, physicians, and so on), and security of our country, and it also entails often tragic consequences for the individuals who succumb to the illusions of getting rich quick in the West.

There can be no doubt that this illegal emigration has expanded not only the intelligence-gathering (through mass interrogations of our citizens), but also the recruitment opportunities of intelligence services, and it has also provided greater opportunities for sending propaganda messages to our people. We are dealing with this problem in a very responsible and selective way, trying to avoid and limit its adverse consequences. What is more, we will continue to investigate the validity of restrictions and limitations imposed in connection with the issuance of passports, a problem which is still giving rise to such a negative climate of opinion with regard to our ministry. The overly simplistic handling of cases and misunderstandings are still occurring in this area. Not everyone who resides abroad for an extended period of time has ties with foreign intelligence services or is even providing them with information. However, anyone who enters into contact with a foreign intelligence service or cooperates with a hostile center will be called to account by our service. This is our mission, and this is the duty of counterintelligence.

I want to stress that the NATO special services are stepping up their activities not only with respect to Poland, but also in relation to the entire socialist community. This gives rise to the need for close collaboration between the fraternal counterintelligence services of our countries. This is our internationalist duty, and at the same time it is one of the main preconditions to mounting an effective resistance against the ubiquitous activities of the special services representing the member countries of this bloc.

Under conditions marked by a rise in the level of both external and internal hostile activities the Ministry of Internal Affairs has continued to implement party policies as defined by the Sixth Plenum of the PZPR Central Committee and reaffirmed by subsequent plenary sessions as the only valid framework for socialist renewal and for finding a political solution to the present crisis. We are committed to these policies, we have been implementing these policies in a consistent manner, and will continue to do so in accordance with the instructions set forth by the 9th Special Congress of the PZPR. By defending our socialist homeland against the espionage activities of hostile special services we are at the same time helping to prevent many people from embarking on the road to treason and also the road that leads to their personal tragedies. Working shoulder to shoulder with the peoples Polish Armed Forces, we will discharge our common duty to the socialist homeland, to the party, and to the nation.

DOMINATION OF LITERARY SCENE BY CEAUSESCU ALLEGED

Brussels LA LIBRE BELGIQUE in French 4 Dec 81 p 6

[Article by N.F., permanent correspondent of LA LIBRE BELGIQUE in Geneva: "Ion Caraion, a Romanian Emigre Poet"]

[Excerpts] "Everything is unreal in our country, everything falls into the realm of the absurd. Just like the stories told by those who fled, in 1940, the Bessarabia occupied by the Soviets and which seemed unbelievable to us." Ion Caraion, poet, prose writer and "inner dissident," according to literary critics in the West, has just asked for political asylum in Switzerland. He tells us of the great troubles of Romanian literature and about his odessy as a leftist in a leftist regime.

First of all, his identity: son of a peasant, descendant of a line of Orthodox priests, he is married to a Jewish woman whose father died in the Nazi camps. Their 14-year old daughter is a Catholic, in accordance with the wishes of her parents. They left Romania thanks to the insistence of religious from the Abbey of Solesmes "where our daughter made her First Communion which was prohibited to her in Romania."

An anti-Nazi journalist during the war, he worked for their newspapers after the liberation. "In 1946, I gave them my resignation. I was arrested in 1950 and sentenced for acts against the social system and then for plotting against the new social system, treason, espionage, etc. I was in prison for 11 years."

What happened after you were released?

One cannot say that I was free. Let us say that I was out of prison. The writer who is destined to forge "the new man" has a privileged status. At least he does not deceive. I deceived. The first volume of my "Journal," an essay of testimonies of former political prisoners, was harshly criticized in the review SAPTAMINA. The review's director, the "writer" Eugen Barbu, said in regard to my subject that "all the prisoners were not detained unjustly." When this same review began to launch an anti-Semitic campaign (see LA LIBRE BELGIQUE of 5 November 1980), I rebelled. The article which I wrote at the time of the death of my friend, the writer Marin Preda, (see LA LIBRE BELGIQUE of 2 July 1980) did not improve the situation; nor did my repeated demands to leave the country.

But while I rose up against the increasing decadence of our literature, Eugen Barbu, highly placed in the hierarchy of the party, which I never consented to join, was promoted to the position of academician. As for me, I received insulting telephone calls night after night.

Did you not appeal to higher authorities?

I had a futile discussion at the "Council for Socialist Culture and Education," a real ministry. But how far can you get when Elena Ceausescu, the president's wife, who reigns over Romanian science and culture, attended school only symbolically, being incapable of continuing her studies beyond the second grade which she repeated. Frightened by the fascist Stalinist atmosphere, we asked to be received by President Ceausescu; our group numbered the best writers including German and Hungarian writers. After months of waiting, we were given an audience, at the end of the first quarter of this year.

And what was his reaction?

Since I had known him ever since my collaboration with the beginning Communist journals, I told him that we were once more in the situation of democracy opposed to fascism, like during the war, when I was being attacked by the newspapers of the right-wing extremists, currently in exile; but now, I was being attacked by the Communist press of the country, in the same terms. Briefly I condemned the fawning, the lying, all the evils which debased Romanian literature. Those who accompanied me supported me. Ceausescu appeared to be deaf; he spouted some slogans about the understanding which should reign among writers, the "constant progress" of our literature which is pluralistic in form, but unanimous in regard to its Marxist content. Finally, he deplored the suppression of preliminary censorship.

How did the writers react?

The reply to Ceausescu came at the Writers Union Congress which began on 1 July. Voices were raised and opinions were expressed with a freedom and with an arrogance which one rarely hears even in the West. After we elected our chairman and the bureau of the Union, a certain Dascalescu, an obscure writer but a member of the executive committee of the Central Committee of the Romanian Communist Party, took out of his pocket a list with the names of another chairman and other members of the bureau. They were substituted for the names of those elected. The trick was played. By Ceausescu who knows how to have the last word, in literature, too.

BELGIAN REPORTER REVIEWS CURRENT POLITICAL SITUATION

Brussels LA LIBRE BELGIQUE in French 2 Dec 81 p 20

[Article by Michel Rosten: "Romanian Uncertainties--the Polish References"]

[Excerpts] The economic crises, the poverty and--one must admit--a press campaign in the West make Romania an ideal candidate to succeed Poland on the big toboggan of peoples democracies. It is very tempting to make analogies between the fates of the two socialist countries to the extent that the events lead observers to formulate, on the basis of identical symptoms, the same diagnosis.

However, there are big differences between the two regimes and certain factors make one think that the Romanian Communist Party has some serious assets which keep it (and which should keep it for some time) from the serious misfortunes which the Polish Communist Party has been suffering for 16 months. In the first place, one cannot discern in Romanian society any consensus of opinion against the Communist Party. The party maintains its antennas, its collaborators and its accomplices at all levels.

The opposition is confined to individual initiatives which are severely, one might say, brutally, repressed. It does not have any organization worthy of the name. As for the church, it shows a confusing docility in regard to the government. The Orthodox Church has 17 million members to whom 6,000 priests minister the needs required by conscience. The state, which advocates atheism, has not wished to (or dared to?) engage in a war with the beliefs which "weigh down" the good people.

The deputy director of the Department of Cults adds: "The state believes that socialism should be a work of all the people. There are many believers in our country. In order for them to renounce their faith it will be necessary to convince them of the progress of science. In the meantime, the relations between the various religions and the state are excellent. All the religions have become members of the Socialist Democracy and Unity National Front organization. Some bishops have been elected deputies. The priests are paid by the state. The clergy help us and we help them."

At the present time, in contrast to what has happened in Poland, no colusion between the church and the faithful against the Communist Party can be envisaged. In addition, there is no tradition of workers struggles in Romania. There have been some notable episodes, especially in the mining sector, but they have not left any tangible results or caused any upheaval at the level of the head of the party. In Warsaw, Comulka and Cierek fell under pressure. In Bucharest, heads also roll but they are not known to the public at large.

From the point of view of the trade unions, the differences between the two countries hardly need to be emphasized. On the banks of the Danube, the strictly socialist concept of the protection of the workers remains. In other words: there could not be any strike in the true sense of the word since every conflict should be resolved before it degenerates. A paunchy trade union leader (Mr Ceausescu, the secretary general of the Central Committee and the president of the Republic has attacked Romanians who eat too much and consume too many calories) gives some explanations:

--The trade unions are in a progressive position. They participate in working out measures intended to eliminate inconveniences appearing in production. They have sought to eliminate causes arising from the negligence of labor organizers. They maintain a dialogue. They have a desire to act in the bosom of the people. They claim to ensure a harmonious development which leads them to maintain a permanent contact both with the party and with the masses.

--But if the activities of the Romanian trade unions are for the welfare of the Romanian workers, how can you explain the tragic story of Mr Paraschiv, the worker who tried to establish a free trade union and was put into a psychiatric hospital and returned to his family in the state of ashes in a small urn?

--As far as I am concerned, this is the first time that I have heard about an attempt to establish a free trade union.

The dialogue stopped as a former ambassador, who had become a trade union official by chance, took up the gauntlet:

--Some people have come to Romania to look for the founders of this so-called free trade union. They found out that the addresses they had were false. And when the Romanian authorities tried to find out who the people on these lists were, they discovered that there were no such people. In regard to freedom of the trade unions, we believe that we are free and that we enjoy complete freedom of action.

--It was barely 2 years ago that the Polish trade union officials were using the same language.

--It is necessary to know the realities, to discover conflicts at the very beginning and to act to resolve them. We do not want to discuss the Polish situation but in our country there is a real connection with the masses. President Ceausescu consults them. In the West you consider that socialism is responsible for all the errors and that the importance of these errors should lead us to renounce socialism. But we have not chosen socialism in order to renounce it.

The power of Mr Ceausescu is solid. But he has been at the helm of his country for 17 years and has thrown overboard certain officers (both brilliant and mediocre) each time that bad weather appeared. Thus he has become progressively exposed to a palace revolution. Thus observers stationed in Bucharest rule out a change in the person heading the party much less than they do a Polish-style popular uprising. That is the source of the Romanian uncertainties.

CHARACTER, CAUSES OF WORK STOPPAGES DISCUSSED

Belgrade RAD in Serbo-Croatian 11 Dec 81 p 10

[Article by Zoran Slavujevic: "Like Every Taboo Subject"]

[Text] An undeveloped theoretical view on certain social phenomena is necessarily accompanied by biases. This is also the case with discussions of work stoppages in Yugoslavia, which have for a long time, and even today, as a taboo subject in many circles, remained inaccessible to the broader public, and thus to scholarly thought as well.

For this reason discussions about the nature of the work stoppages are still accompanied by a dogmatic denial of them as a form of the struggle by parts of the working class, or even by an uncritical acceptance of them as a significant and effective method in the struggle by a group of workers to improve its position. Even if certain efforts are being made to consider more thoroughly the nature of work stoppages in a self-managing society, they have not gone any further than establishing a division between "acceptable" and "unacceptable" work stoppages, or a mere assertion that they are a contradictory social phenomenon. In any case, a dialectical understanding of the contradictory nature of work stoppages is lacking, and in place of this we are offered a division into "good" and "bad" work stoppages, or an eclectic combination of the "positive" and "negative" elements of work stoppages.

Not Only a Type of Class Struggle

The contradictory nature of work stoppages is revealed, however, in the levels of analysis of this social phenomenon--in the originators of work stoppages, their causes, reasons, and goals and their attitude toward self-management as a social relationship, their attitude toward the mechanism for self-managing decision-making, the relationship between the intentions and the objective socio-political consequences of work stoppages, etc.

In principle, depending on the person, work stoppages represent a form of class struggle, because the workers are always trying to use work stoppages to satisfy certain interests. Nevertheless, dwelling on this means dwelling on an abstract and idealized definition of the working class as a revolutionary subject a priori, in any situation, at any time, and in any part of it. In actuality the social essence of the working class is a profoundly contradictory essence: the working class is a revolutionary subject that draws its revolutionary potential from the elements of its hired position that are reproduced in the still contradictory nature of social relationships in socialism. In them the working class is constituted into the leading social force in the interweaving of complex mediations in the relationships between social essence and social consciousness, historical interest and immediate interest, end and means, everyday and epochal, etc.

The complexity of these mediations and of the elevation of the working class to a revolutionary subject over a long period of class conflicts and with the necessity for continual renewal of all of these processes with every new situation, and with every concrete case of social activity, leaves room for the manifestation of many contradictions within the working class as a socialogically heterogeneous social group, and for the manifestations of partial interests by some parts of it, group-proprietor aspirations, a hired mentality, and so forth. The rest of the contradictions of work stoppages originate in the contradictory nature of the social relationships and the social essence of the working class, and the differing level of the development of class consciousness among individual parts of it as subjects.

Several Contradictions

The contradictory nature of work stoppages is also expressed through the very different causes and reasons, and particularly through the different demands made by the workers who are stopping the work. In the most general sense, this has to do with the contradiction between the concrete goal of the work stoppage and self-management as a social relationship. Work stoppages frequently begin as a reaction by a group of workers to undeveloped self-management relations, primarily in OURs [organizations of associated labor] (often work stoppages begin because of technocratic usurpations of the self-managing rights of workers and the obstinacy of individuals), but also elsewhere, even up to the level of the overall social community (there are work stoppages that are a reaction by groups of workers to the bad material position of OURs and the transfer of income on the basis of unequal business conditions). Work stoppages, however, also begin as a form of resistance to the establishment of new socio-economic relationships, with the goal of preserving the rights and privileges that they have achieved, at the expense of other parts of the working class (demands that individual groups of workers be paid bonuses for overfulfilling the plan even though the organization has not sold its products, a transfer to a new system for distributing funds for individuals, etc.). In such cases the workers who are stopping work are not acting as the representatives of class interests, but rather of partial and egotistical interests, and instead of a desire for self-managing relationships to be developed, it is desired that the group-proprietor relationship be maintained.

Work stoppages are also contradictory from the standpoint of their relationship to the mechanism for self-managing decision-making. They appear in spite of the self-managing institutions, and very frequently, even before all of the possibilities for action through the self-managing mechanism have been utilized. But they appear as a result of the (non) operation of the self-managing mechanisms, in regard to it, and with the aim of exerting pressure on the self-managing institutions to have some issue settled in a certain way or to have it settled at all.

Although work stoppages are an "extra-institutional," "extra-systemic" form of the struggle of the workers, their action is most frequently directed directly against the mechanism of self-management itself. They appear in areas where the mechanism for self-managing decision-making is not operating, or is used mostly to legalize the previously made decisions of management bodies and influential factors within and outside the OURs. They also appear, however, in areas where self-managing decision-making by the workers is being implemented, but where some groups of workers who have not succeeded in achieving their partial interests are trying to politicize them at any cost, and to force their acceptance in spite of the democratic procedure, though again by the competent self-managing body.

A Criticism of Concrete Practice

Furthermore, a contradiction can be noted between the intentions and the objective consequences of work stoppages. Although a work stoppage is an expression of workers' demands for the satisfaction of certain interests of theirs, its incidental nature and the relatively brief politicization of the workers cannot replace the need for daily and continued participation in the implementation of their self-managing fights. For this reason, there is a contradiction between the effectiveness of work stoppages in regard to resolving concrete circumstance, and their ineffectiveness in regard to a more radical change in social relationships within the organization itself (this is confirmed by the cases of a repetition of work stoppages at individual OURs, even when the concrete demands of the workers had previously been met and the immediate causes had been eliminated, and the directors and others designated as enemies of self-management had been replaced), and especially in a broader framework.

The contradictions between the intentions and the objective consequences of work stoppages also originate partially in the fact that a strong politicization of the workers in work stoppages frequently entails recognition of and taking into account a non-self-managing concentration of social power in the hands of individuals outside the OURs (they often count on direct involvement by the president of the DPZ assembly or by the Party and union officials of the commune, republic, province, etc.), thus justifying the activity of factors who are not authorized to act for this purpose as factors in the self-management system, and affirming their role as arbitrators.

These and other contradictions of work stoppages show that it is not possible to accept or reject them as a form of the struggle by the workers for the development of self-management, without a concrete analysis of each case, the concrete conditions in which they begin, the degree of the development of self-management, and their concrete causes, reasons, and goals, in order to establish their real nature and perform a social evaluation of the intentions of the group of workers who have stopped work. This analysis is not only a prerequisite for conducting concrete political action and taking the necessary measures; such an attitude toward work stoppages is also necessary because, regardless of their contradictory nature, they always represent (an acceptable or unacceptable) criticism of the concrete practice and work of individual socio-political organizations and bodies, either because they have not been resolute in participating in the development of self-management relations and implementing the self-managing rights of workers (in curbing bureaucratic and technocratic expropriations of the rights of workers, but also the group-proprietary, egotistical, and partial aspirations of groups of workers, the hired psychology, etc.), or because of the fact that they are not making use of their constitutional rights and obligations with respect to settling disputes in associated labor that could not be settled through the regular channels.

PARTY PAPER CRITICIZES 'DEFEATIST' ATTITUDES

Belgrade KOMMUNIST in Serbo-Croatian 27 Nov 81 p 15

[Article by Prvoslav Ralic: "A Calculated Defeatism"]

[Text] In the last few months, it has been possible to detect a certain "ideological offensive" by various "demystifiers" of Yugoslav socialist self-managing society. From where have they appeared so aggressively on the scene, precisely at this time? What is motivating them so strongly to look under society's skirt with a voyeuristic passion? Are they the product of some subsequent democratization of our society, or is it a question of an assessment by the right-wing forces in our country that their time has come, and that it is therefore necessary to spread ideological confusion over the strategic revolutionary orientation of this society.

We are hearing and reading various defeatist statements about the fact that this society, together with its leading political forces, has become involved in a crisis to such an extent taat there is no longer any way out of this crisis. The ideological message of this calculated defeatism is obvious: our society can be led further only by certain "new political forces." In a relatively short time, these "critics" of society have said everything that they had to say. But they did not say anything; they only "explained" themselves. They have expressed themselves in a way that indicates that they deliberately do not want to recognize the builders of this society, and that they do not see the crisis of society in revolutionary terms, but rather in political terms--counting on some new relationship of political forces into which their right-wing restorationist ambitions would fit comfortably.

The Crisis --- Breakdown Or Stimulus?

How does one find oneself on the other side of the defeatist understanding of the crisis of our society? How should the crisis be viewed in revolutionary terms? It is the theoretical and ideological task of the organized subjective forces to give answere to these questions.

We must rebel against the fault-finders' statement about the crisis. A crisis does not denote only hopelessness, chaos, mere disorganzation, and an exclusively negative tendency. A crisis is also evidence of what has not been done, which orientations have been accepted and which have been rejected by actual social practice, which relationship of forces is the one that is unfavorable in society, which social forces are not on the scene but ought to be, what the real limits are to the development of socialist self-management, and how and by whom the limits should be destroyed. We must learn to view a crisis as a dissoultion of what exists, as a reasonable trial of a nonsocialist practice and insufficiently thought-out orientations. Viewing a crisis in revolutionary terms means creating a new questioning and critical attitude, because a social crisis is always a crisis in the society's basic practice and its orientation in time.

If it wants to surmount this crisis and not serve to deepen and intensify it, a view of the social crisis must reveal its roots and those who are responsible for it, and the ways and means to surmount it. A mere contention about society's being in a crisis conceals the essence of the crisis and deepens it. A defeatist view of the social crisis is a crisis present in this view and a crisis of thought as such. We therefore need a creative, revolutionary statement about the crisis.

A way out of the crisis could consist of the successful achievement of what has been endangered. What has been endangered is socialist self-management. The crisis is really bringing to light all of the seriousness with which one must approach further theoretical formulation of the problems and the development of orientations for socialist self-management. The depth of the crisis and its extent both require radical revolutionary action.

The social crisis is thus not only a warning about the "remnant" of the old, its insistance and claim to legalization, but also a crucial reminder of the need for the emergence of something authentically new. Every social crisis is a product of history, and so it cannot be surmounted without new historical creative action. The consequences must be drawn form Marx's position that "Communism is the solution to a crisis." In accordance with this, we cannot resolve our social crisis without new Communist activity.

The right-wing forces in our society, by the nature of things, reject any vanguard role for the League of Communists. They openly wirte about the obsolescence of this organization, and challenge the authority of its forums. Today it is necessary to be resolutely opposed to anti-Party standpoints. Criticism of the Party is one thing, and it must be open and constant. It is another thing, however, to see a "conspiracy" in the Party, and challenge Party organization. Whose interest is it in to have the working class without its historically created vanguard, for the Party to be without leadership, and for it to lack ideological unity regarding the strategy of the Yugoslav socialist revolution? This is in the interest of the forces that have brought us to the social crisis that we are experiencing. Thus the question must be posed: what is really in a crisis in our society? What are the real roots of the crisis?

Are all of the revolutionary, social, productive, creative subjective forces of our society in a crisis, or is this a matter of a crisis of those parts of the social organization which have objectively become an obstacle to the development of socialist self-management? The essence and nature of the crisis, and those responsible for it, must be identified. We do not need a demagogically negative, restrictive statement about the crisis. This has always been an unhistorical statement. A social crisis is not just a simple paralysis of society, but rather evidence that there has been a shift in the relationship among the driving forces of social development, a change in the relationship of political forces, a removal of those responsible for revolutionary practice, a loss of the sharpness and radicalness of the social revolution, a weakening of the vanguard role of the League of Communists, a breakdown in the system of values, and an emergence of a social structure of society that resists revolutionary changes. The stagnation in the development of socialist self-management--and this stagnation is the very essence of the crisis of which we are speaking--has made possible the formation of certain social layers on a nonsocialist property basis, who are now wondering where the discussions of a social crisis are coming from, when in fact they have never been better off.

A way out of the crisis can clearly not be found through the factors and forces that have led to the crisis. A way out of it can be found only through those who are bearing the consequences of the crisis in their own lives. Thus the interpretation of the crisis in Yugoslavia should not be just a forum interpretation; it must be a substantive one. Active awareness of overcoming the crisis must be widespread, and it must be formed in the world of labor itself. This means that those bearing mass responsibility for self-managing initiatives must become involved in searching for a way out of the crisis, along with the revolutionary-productive forces of labor and creativity, the organized subjective forces of society who are guided in their activity by the criteria of revolutionary practice, who know the historical collaboration of revolutionary practice and revolutionary theory to be realistic and concrete.

Not Alleviating, But Overcoming the Crisis

When revolutionary activity is in a crisis, then this is evidence that it has lost its radical nature and liberating role. The reasons for this lie in sectorial pressures: pressures from the autonomous political sphere in the LCY and the state, pressures from autonomous isstitutions in the political and economic systems, and pressures from labor divided into managers and executors. The more mediation there is between people, the less room there is for revolutionary initiative and creativity. It is obvious that we need a new revolutionary initiative from the masses and corresponding vanguard activity by the League of Communists. We need an ideological differentiation in the League of Communists that would free it from non-revolutionary and non-vanguard behavior, and prevent resistance within it to more radical development of socialist self-management and the Yugoslav socialist community. Room must be made for critical thoughts and acts, so that the system of socialist self-management will not be enslaved by the taboos of "systemic" decisions and so that it will be effectively implemented--in accordance with the real possibilities for its development.

Instead of alleviating the crisis, we must find a way out of it. Thus every statement about stabilizing this society can no longer be a sectorial one. We will not achieve stabilization by quantitative measurements. We do not need some mere stability. We must discover the means of achieving the crucial social stability, the stability of revolutionary development, and those responsible for it. We need clear criteria for socialism, progress in self-management, and criteria for Communist activity for the present conditions. The League of Communists must be based to a much greater extent in the processes and movements of the liberation of human labor, and must not allow all of the interests of the existing world of labor to be reflected in it.

Tito's warning is current today, as it was once before: "There is no one who will help us unless we do help ourselves and unless we rely on our own forces; there is no one who will solve our problems unless our working people solve them themselves through their work and their efforts." Demagogic and defeatist statements about the crisis of our society do not take into account the fact we can surmount the crisis that we are experiencing only through our own forces and revolutionary action. The best response to defeatism will be radicalization of the struggle for socialist self-management. Approaching its congresses, the League of Communists must prepare itself for this.

BRIEFS

HOSTILE PROPAGANDA--Vladimir Seks (38), lawyer from Osijek, was sentenced on Thursday by the district court in Osijek to 13 months in prison for hostile propaganda. The Osijek public prosecutor charged Seks with hostile propaganda directed against the socialist system and security of Yugoslavia. It was established that three times in the spring of 1981 the accused had falsely described in public places the political situation in our country, had slandered the social order and called for the break-up of the brotherhood and unity of our peoples and nationalities. SENTENCED FOR HOSTILE PROPAGANDA--Yesterday Sacir (Acifa) Salija (1959) from the village of Orcuse near Gostivar, former worker in "Energoinvest" residing in Sarajevo, was sentenced to 2 years in prison by the criminal council of the Sarajevo district court for the criminal act of hostile propaganda based on Article 133, paragraph 1 of the SFRY Criminal Code. In September 1981 before a group of workers, Salija called for a change (in violation of the constitution) of the socialist self-management system and presented in a malicious and untruthful way the sociopolitical conditions in the country. ARRESTS LINKED TO FIRE--Etem Rogova, investigative judge of the Prizren Opstina Court, has imprisoned eight persons because of the fire which broke out on 5 November in the department store in Prizren; those arrested include the night guard, the head of the auto-parts display, head of the paint and varnish display, and several clerks [all named]. The court believes that they are all responsible for the fire which caused tens of millions of dinars in damage. Investigation of the fire is drawing to a close, pending a report from experts of the Federal SUP (Secretariat for Internal Affairs) in Belgrade. SRAJEVO FACULTY CRITICISM--At a critical discussion on 16 December of the Action Conference of the LC organizatin in the "Veljko Vlahovic" political science faculty in Srajevo it was said that a stagnation of the faculty has been felt in the last few years resulting from disrupted interpersonal relations and undeveloped self-management. Delegates from the 18 basic LC organizations in the faculty devoted particular attention to current relations among communists which require critical reexamination. Interpersonal relations have reached a serious crisis, and confrontation among individuals has escalated to antagonism which has turned into personal hatred and intolerance, some even with nationalistic characteristics, it was said at the meeting. Some members of this faculty stop at nothing in their mutual settling of accounts, while disruptive personal relations are also having a negative effect on the students. In the discussions the cases of Dr Nenad Kecmanovic and Dr Vojislav Seselj were mentioned several times because of their articles in the press recently. The present situation burdened with problems has seriously shaken the reputation of this advanced educational institution where 1,700 regular and 1,500 part-time students are enrolled. Participating in the Conference meeting were Hamdija Pozderac, member of the LCY CC Presidium, and Vlado Sultanovic, member of the CC of the LC of Bosnia-Hercegovina. [Excerpt] [Belgrade BORBA in Serbo-Croatian 17 Dec 81 p 3]

CLERGY DECORATED--At a ceremony yesterday in the Bosnia-Hercegovina Republic Assembly Munir Mesihovic, president of the SAWP Republic Conference, presented decorations to seven religious officials in our republic from the SFRY Presidency for special services in promoting relations between the state and religious communities, cultivating brotherhood and unity of our peoples and nationalities, and for their overall contribution to the advancement of our society. Those decorated were [Catholic] Brother Vlado Karlovic, [Orthodox] Priest Dragoljub Jankovic, and hadzi hafiz Husein efendeija Mujic, [Orthodox] Priest Momir Umicevic, [Catholic] Priest Marko Salic, and imam Mustafa efendija Nurkic, as well as Dr Ahmed efendija Smajlovic. [Excerpt] [Sarajevo OSLOBODJENJE in Serbo-Croatian 24 Nov 81 p 1]

SLOGANS IN UROSEVAC--The fact that some of the youth continue to "spread poison" is shown by the fact that the pamphlets and slogans found in almost every restaurant are mostly by young people. Discussions at the recent meeting of the Socialist Youth League pointed out that young people in this opstina must carry the fight more decisively against these manifestations, especially by independently uncovering all those who are carrying out hostile action. [Excerpt] [Pristina JEDINSTVO in Serbo-Croatian 15 Dec 81 p 8]

BEATINGS IN PEC--At the 11 December Pec Opstina SUBNOR [Federation of Veterans' Associations of the People's Liberation War] presidium meeting excesses were again reported resulting from hostile action which goes beyond all limits with regard to personal security. The report of the presidium says: "We are faced with hostile actions from the writing of slogans and pamphlets to physical attacks on citizens, which [attacks] unfortunately happened the day before yesterday in Pec, where several citizens of Serbian and Montenegrin nationality were beaten and some of them seriously injured....Government organs in their work to suppress vandalism have not lived up to the trust citizens should have in them, because there is the conviction among citizens that it is difficult for one to move about freely." The presidium demanded that energetic measures be taken to assure the security of citizens and their property. [Excerpt] [Pristina JEDINSTVO in Serbo-Croatian 12 Dec 81 p 3]

PARTY OUSTERS IN PEC--At a 10 December meeting of the Pec LC Opstina Committee it was reported that opportunism, liberalism, the forming of groups, abuse of positions, and violations of self-management had disrupted interpersonal and internationality relations at certain work organizations and institutions, primarily at the "Agrometohija" [Wholesale, Retail Trade] organization, the OUR for Joint Service in the Agricultural-Industrial Combine, and the "Saban

Spahija" technical school center in Pec Opstina, where tasks have been poorly carried out and where there are various abuses, negligence, and other negative phenomena in contradiction to the LCY program and statute. The opstina committee decided to expel from the party eight members of the "Agrometohija organization [these and others below all named are both Serbs and Albanians], to replace the director and to place the organization under receivership; in addition to expelling the director from the LC, it was recommended that he also be expelled from the SAWP Opstina Conference. It was also proposed that the "Prokletije" Forestry Enterprise be placed in receivership and the director removed, that 12 [named] employees of the [above-cited] OUR in the Pec Agricultural-Industrial Combine be expelled from the party, that the director, as well as the head of accounting, of the OUR be removed and the OUR placed in receivership. It was also proposed that 11 professors and the former director of the Technical School Center be expelled from the party and 7 others given party warnings. Finally, the committee suggested that the LC organization in the Pec Social Accounting Service take measures against Inspector Milan Djordjevic for doing poor work. [Excerpt] [Pristina JEDINSTVO in Serbo-Croatian 12 Dec 81 p 3]

SARAJEVO FACULTY MEMBERS CRITICIZED--In the long discussions at yesterday's and last night's meetings of the Action Conference of the LC in the "Veljko Vlahovic" political science faculty in Sarajevo many critical words were spoken against the conduct of a number of communists; the judgment was made that interpersonal relations are at the lowest level and that individuals had gotten far too much out of line. In this regard severe judgment was made of the behavior of recently elected docent Dr Vojislav Seselj who has written articles in the press with questionable and unacceptable content. Using insinuations, truths and half-truths, imputation and provocations, it was said that he imposed great damage on the faculty and its party organization, as well as on individual faculty members as a result of which he was recently expelled from the LC. Also criticized was Dr Nenad Kecmanovic who last night, while nagging at everyone and criticizing everyone, defended Seselj in an unprincipled and unfounded way. Hamdija Pozderac, member of the LCY CC Presidium, present at the discussion, condemned the behavior of the two young instructors, as well as all similar unfounded "sniping" in this faculty, and advocated the continuation of a principled, democratic dialogue until there is complete political differentiation from those whose behavior and views diverge from LC policy. [Excerpt] [Belgrade BORBA in Serbo-Croatian 18 Dec 81 p 4]

KOSOVO LC MEMBERS--At yesterday's meeting the Kosovo Provincial LC Committee decided that the 13th meeting of the LC Conference of Kosovo will be held in April 1982. Judging from the latest data, at the end of 1981, Kosovo will have 98,000 members (at the end of September it had 91,335 members). They will be represented at the 13th Conference by 310 delegates who must be elected by 31 March 1982. At the same time there are an additional 95 current members of the provincial LC committee, as well as members of the statute commission and of the control commission of the Kosovo LC, who have delegate status, so that the number of Conference delegates will total 433. According to the decision of the LC provincial committee, the number of delegates from the ranks of direct producers and private farmers will be more than their percentage in the LC of Kosovo, while a little less than half of the delegates will be from organizations of associated labor, then, in appropriate ratio, from the ranks of youth, veterans, education, science, culture, and health. PUBLICATION OF NEW POLITICAL, SOCIAL STUDIES REVIEW

[Excerpts] By decision of the Central Committee of the Albanian Workers Party the publication of the bulletin STUDIME POLITIKO-SHOQERORE [Socio-Political Studies] by the Institute for Marxist-Leninist Studies has begun. According to this decision, this organ will contain "studies of a political, ideological, and socio-economic nature, written by research institutions, institutions of higher education, central organs of the mass organizations, party committees, etc, articles of criticism for domestic and foreign social sciences publications, and certain unpublished party documents" etc.

Many social studies, from headquarters and the grassroots, will be in the bulletin STUDIME POLITIKO-SHOQERORE. They will be studies which make a concrete contribution to the resolution of economic and social problems related to the tasks of the 7th five-year plan and the future development of the country, for the creation of deep convictions among the masses in regard to the possibility of fulfilling the tasks of the plan, for the mobilization and fullest use of the energies and creative capacities of the people, for the surmounting of the obstacles resulting from difficulties of growth and from the imperialist-revisionist blockade as well as from the world economic and financial crisis.

Studies of a political and socio-ideological nature connected with problems of the socialist superstructure will be represented extensively in the bulletin. The bulletin will include studies on various issues of international relations, the world communist and workers movement, the peoples liberation movement, and present-day world development, having as a basis the revolutionary foreign policy of our party, especially the profound Marxist-Leninist analysis of the international situation, which the 8th party congress made and the pertinent guidelines which it gave in the field of foreign policy.

In light of the fact that our party plays a vanguard militant role in the defense of Marxism-Leninism, a special place in the bulletin will be occupied by studies to expose the ideology, policies and practical activity of various currents of modern revisionism--Soviet, Yugoslav, Chinese and Eurocommunist. These studies are valuable for the revolutionary education of our communists and workers, so that they will assimilate, as thoroughly as possible, the revolutionary line of the party for the uninterrupted development of the socialist revolution and continually strengthen their confidence in the inevitable victory of socialism on the international level.

In the field of history, chiefly studies on the history of the Albanian Workers Party will be represented in the bulletin. The Institute of Marxist-Leninist Studies, after preparing the second publication of the text of the hisotry of the AWP, has intended, in the coming years, to undertake general studies on the historic experience of the party in regard to certain great issues of its revolutionary activity, such as the Marxist-Leninist (political, philosophical, economic, cultural and military) thought of the party, the strategy and tactics of the party in the various stages of the revolution, issues related to the construction and the inner life of the party, the struggle of the party against modern revisionism, etc. Other central institutions, in addition to the Institute, will prepare studies on this topic. Research work on various topics of party history will also begin in the district.

The bulletin will also include studies with the special aim of combatting and unmasking the slanders and distortions of Albanian historic and contemporary reality, which are executed systematically by so-called scientific institutions, historians and sociologists in the capitalist and revisionist countries.

Just like all social studies, the bulletin STUDIME POLITIKO-SHOQERORE, which is being initiated after the 8th party congress, must respond to these tasks by ensuring the high scientific level of the material published in it. All workers in the social sciences, in implementing the directives of this Congress, must act with systematic persistence to carry out a more profound scientific research work, to struggle for the elimination of all schematism and jargon which are often found in social studies, for the implementation of a more truly scientific, Marxist-Leninist methodology, and to perfect the organization of research work. But the execution of obligations in regard to the social sciences is not an issue solely for scientific workers and institutions. It is a matter for the party organs and organizations as the 8th plenum of the Central Committee of the Albanian Workers Party stressed "they must understand and value the importance of scientific activity more than they have up to now." They must direct this activity closely so that it will be developed completely in accordance with the directives and guidelines of the party.

The bulletin STUDIME POLITIKO-SHOQERORE will be published twice a year. The Central Committee of the party has charged the Institute of Marxist-Leninist Studies with the task of publishing the bulletin but the institute can carry out the assigned duty only with close cooperation among all social science research and teaching institutions, all party committees, government organs and mass organizations.

SYSTEM OF MANAGEMENT CHECKS, DOUBLECHECKS

Prague TRIBUNA in Czech No 45, 11 Nov 81 p 12

[Interview with Eng Jan Roubal, deputy chairman of the CSSR People's Control Committee, by Jiri Janouskovec: "An Important Management Tool"; date and place not specified]

> [Text] Just what is control? The reply to this question would be quite simple if we understood control as just inspecting the state of things. But because it deals with the behavior and actions of people under specific conditions, appraises the results of their work and the reasons why there are deviations from prescribed courses, it is not such a simple matter.
> That is why we asked to interview a person with a wealth of experience in matters of control--the deputy chairman of the CSSR People's Control Committee, Eng Jan Roubal.

[Question] With the gradual implementation of the Set of Measures for Improving the Planned Management System of the National Economy a whole series of regulations was issued which prescribe and define relations within organizations as well as between enterprises and subordinate bodies and also some others. Among the important documents is CSSR Government Resolution No 190 of July of this year--Measures to Improve the System of Control in the National Economy and State Administration.

What is the significance of control under present conditions and in the present stage of implementing the Set of Measures?

[Answer] No system of management can rely on the automatic operation of its tools, on some kind of self-control. And it is no different at the present time when the Set of Measures is being implemented. It is the people who put it into operation. The effectiveness of improving the management system depends on their procedures and actions. And that leaves a lot of room for the influence of control.

Control cannot operate in isolation from the management system of society. It is an integral part of it. It pursues the same goals, it advocates efficient operation of management tools and it ascertains and signals the presence of deviations. But that would not be enough. Control must try to bring about correction! And that is one of its most important roles at the present time.

[Question] What is the current structure of control bodies and what do you think are the main problems of their work?

[Answer] We cannot say that we are suffering from a shortage of control bodies. There are many of them operating in the national economy. Basically, they may be grouped into two large groups according to their relationship to direct management. First of all, there are the so-called external control bodies which check on organizations without regard to their departmental affiliation. These include, for example, the people's control committees, state inspectorates, state testing facilities and also inspections conducted by state bodies, particularly in the areas of finance, planning, prices and wages.

The other large group consists of so-called internal control which is conducted along managerial lines. These include control units of ministries, general management bodies, enterprises and organizations. However, special units are also supposed to exercise control within the area of their jurisdiction and on individual levels of management in the area of their jurisdiction.

The most important kind of internal control, however, is that carried out by supervisory personnel as part of their managerial work. It may be designated as the most effective because it can be conducted regularly, every day, and any areas containing fundamental problems of organization can be selected and appropriate decisions made for rapid corrective measures. No agency can take the place of that kind of control.

If we exclude the workers in technical control, there are about 19,000 inspectors and checkers working in the whole republic. That number of people should be sufficient. Unfortunately, that is far from the case. Many control bodies are small operations involved in the solution of important problems of the national economy. Often they only ascertain various deficiencies but take little initiative to try to eliminate the causes. Nor do their efforts to tighten discipline always have the desired emphasis or results. Technical control suffers most from this problem and so do many aspects of internal control in general.

[Question] The CPCZ Central Committee and the government of the CSSR discussed the Measures to Improve the System of Control. From this it is apparent that raising the efficiency of the control system is of great importance. Why are they proceeding with changes in the control system already implemented, when will the changes be put into effect and what do they consist of?

[Answer] First to the changes. There are a number of reasons why they are necessary. Many control bodies have not yet formed adequate barriers to undesirable or even antisocial activity. They put little emphasis on eliminating defects and firming up discipline and responsibility. They only uncovered the deficiencies but made little effort to eliminate them. In other words, control did not, with some exceptions, become a real management component. These practices of many control bodies did not meet the needs of the management system before 1981, much less are they adequate to the needs stemming from the Set of Measures for Improving the Planned Management System of the National Economy.

The measures adopted are aimed at assuring high effectiveness of control, directing it toward the main tasks of development of the national economy and the inspection activities themselves and at the same time making sure they are impartial. Control is supposed to strengthen the efficacy of state administration of the national economy, be an inseparable part of it, one of its tools--all this not only on the central level but at all levels of management. The interests and needs of society must be pursued everywhere.

Prevention is more clearly emphasized in the measures adopted. This means coming up with control findings at the time that important problems are being discussed and decided on by the government, the ministries, general management bodies, enterprises and national committees. After all, this is logical--it is much better to anticipate problems than to have to solve or correct them later, often with unfavorable consequences.

And the time of implementation? The governments--federal and national--have prescribed that all measures are to be instituted without delay so that no later than the beginning of next year they will be reflected in distinctly improved effectiveness of the work of every control body.

[Question] In the course of preparing the data for the CSSR government resolution, surely they also evaluated past experience in control work. Could you tell us what has impaired the effectiveness of control up to now and perhaps still does?

[Answer] There are several causes. Basically, there is no doubt that many control bodies concentrated on partial and secondary problems. That kind of orientation represents very little help to management bodies and supervisory personnel. Many control bodies assigned low standards for their operations. Instead of directing their work toward the elimination of deficiencies, making permanent remedies and assuring positive developments, they were content with measures which could not bring about changes or reverse unfavorable developments.

It was forgotten that the control of any kind of material problem cannot cease with the adoption of measures but must follow through with consistent application. And in the case of internal and technical controls, supervisors did not always make conditions conducive to impartiality in their work.

All of these problems are clearly resolved in the measures adopted.

[Question] Control is an essential part of the work of all supervisory personnel. Nevertheless, it is not always appreciated. Why?

[Answer] Yes, that is true. But the reason will not be found in control itself. The remedy is not in ordering management personnel to do control work. Let us rather seek the answer in the area of evaluating the work of supervisory and all other management workers. As long as superior bodies judge their work on the basis of how many different directives, instructions or orders they issued and how many meetings they held, then they will consider these formal actions as fulfillment of their responsibilities rather than looking to actual results.

Nor can we expect that in the future all management workers will consider control as an essential part of their work.

In fact, the management worker must be judged, as emphasized at the 16th CPCZ Congress, according to the results achieved in the sector he manages. If this principle is consistently applied, then everyone will realize the need for controls and will organize them himself.

[Question] Deficiencies exist not only in the control operations of lower levels of management but also in VHJs [economic production units] and ministries. What must be done to improve the qulaity of control on this level?

[Answer] Briefly put, in their orientation, in providing for their objectivity and in close association with management operations. Control units in these management elements up to now have been oriented toward periodic reviews of management which of course revealed various disorders, but the status of management definitely did not improve. There was little room left for checking into key problems or for tasks which are essential to the successful fulfillment of the function of the department or sector for the whole national economy. Today, on the basis of the measures, the conditions are better for directing the work of control units.

All production ministries, certain others, and all central bodies are establishing the position of chief controller whose job will be to set up and coordinate the work of the entire internal control system. Among his important duties is attendance at meetings of management boards where he will submit information and experiences of control on matters under discussion. The objectivity of his work and the operations of the unit he manages will be enhanced by the fact that he will be appointed to his job and recalled from it by the minister in the case of chief controller of an enterprise, otherwise by the VHJ manager.

[Question] The principles of socialist society make it possible and, in fact, require, the participation of workers in management, thus also in control. How will the control system make this participation possible?

[Answer] Everything that was created here resulted from the work of the people. So one can understand that state and economic bodies rely on the initiative of the workers, that they make use of their motivation and suggestions. Therefore, all control bodies, not only people's control committees, which have regular contact with workers must develop cooperation with leading workers, agriculturists, with brigades of socialist labor, with innovators, design engineers and technologists, with workers of research and scientific centers, in accordance with the matter at hand and the problem under examination. A broad base for developing people's participation in control work can also be found by increasing the cooperation of control bodies with social organizations, especially the ROH [Revolutionary Trade Union Movement], the SSM [Union of Socialist Youth] and the Union of Women. It has proven productive to discuss control decisions and measures adopted with managerial workers at political-union aktivs directly in enterprises and plants. They are important because, with the participation of control bodies, the workers are also informed about how certain abuses will be eliminated which they often themselves pointed out at production conferences, and also they themselves can look for ways to contribute toward carrying out the measures adopted.

[Question] Worker participation in control also calls for social control. Where is the place for it?

[Answer] Yes, this involves control carried out by the workers, by the citizens in general and also that carried out by social organizations affiliated in the National Front, citizens' committees, the commissions of national committees and others. In the system of control there are, besides the people's control committees of town and local national committees also plant commissions of people's control. They operate without professional personnel, relying only on the work of their members and other volunteer workers.

[Question] To raise the effectiveness of control in the national economy and state administration it is essential to assure increased responsibility by workers of control bodies themselves. Where does this responsibility lie?

[Answer] Control can claim credit for an active part in the results which society has achieved in the past. All control bodies and all workers, however, must also be aware of their joint responsibility in those cases where prescribed objectives have not been met.

At the present time, the whole system of control stands before the task which may be expressed by these words: We must carry out the conclusions of the 16th CPCZ Congress. We face a challenging period in our development. If control is to fulfill its social mission at this stage it must make a basic change in the quality and effectiveness of its own work. With full commitment, it must work to resolve problems and overcome difficulties. It must give management bodies and organization heads more help in their work.

That is a great responsibility, not only for officials and management personnel of all control bodies, but for every controller personally.

[Interviewer] Thank you for the interview.

CPCZ CULTURAL WEEKLY EVALUATES SOLIDARITY

Prague TVORBA in Czech No 46, 18 Nov 81 p 11

[Article by Viktor Borsky: "The Face of Polish Counterrevolution"]

[Text] The recent meeting of Solidarity officials in Gdansk confirmed even in its official program that this union, until recently pretending to be a "trade" representation has, without doubt, adopted a platform of a "social," i.e., political organization. Insofar as the program adopted at this meeting still contains mention of trade union activity, this constitutes merely a supplement intended to serve as a facade for those segments of worker membership which have not yet seen through the aims of the leadership.

Demands and Ultimatums

The programmatic declaration adopted by Solidarity in early October, contains a list of demands of a clearly counterrevolutionary orientation. This program in its substance was again ratified at the session of the all-Polish Solidarity leadership in Gdansk, held on 3-4 November. Solidarity demands:

--Reform of the Polish state on the basis of allowing a so-called free play of political forces, with the elimination of the leading role of the communist party under the thesis that "the state cannot identify itself with any one political party." Along these lines, it demands the holding of so-called free elections based on the rejection of the existing election law and the whole system of the National Front. The "free" nature of these elections will lie in that Solidarity will direct the preelection campaign and manipulate it through a new election law which it wants to "present" to Polish society in early December. Given the well-known semifascist methods of the Solidarity agitation teams in enforcing the interests of this union's leadership, there is little doubt how "free" such elections would really be;

--Revision of Polish international political and economic obligations under the guise of "reliable guarantees within the framework of international alliances" and the need for "restricting military expenditures to the minimum," which in fact means severing Poland's ties with the socialist community in the military, as well as economic sphere. Solidarity thus fully obliges the Reagan administration in its effort to disrupt the balance of forces in the world;

--Separation of "political and economic powers," i.e., abolishing the leading role of the communist party in economic management and cadre policy. In this connection, Solidarity rejects the government program of economic stabilization, and its leadership meeting of 4 November confirmed that it will call for a so-called referendum on the question of self-management in enterprises. This demand, in fact, represents an attempt to liquidate the socialist production system in Poland in favor of retail production and the private sector;

--Full control of information media by Solidarity and the abolition of "state monopoly" in this sphere. Simultaneously, it proclaims that it is entitled (by whom?) to establish its own information media, including radio and television stations. These stations are to be furnished by the intermediary of the yellow trade union center, AFL-CIO, and paid for by CIA funds.

In its program, Solidarity also demanded immunity for perpetrators of counterrevolutionary activity and overall restrictions on the security organs (this while criminal activity is constantly on the rise in Poland). In reading this "program," a justifiable question arises, namely, who are its real authors and whom is it to serve? The Polish working class and other working people? Not likely.

Godfathers in the "Committee for Workers Defense"

In order to reply to the above question, we have to go back a few years to the early 1970s. It was then that the foundation of a new strategy began to appear, a strategy which was to reduce selected socialist countries into a state in which they could easily be "impregnated" by counterrevolution, as stated, for example, by the American authors T.W. Stanley and D.M. Witt in their book Diplomacy of Detente (Entspanungsdiplomatie, Baden Baden 1971, page 117). This was to be imperialism's reply to the principles of peaceful coexistence which was being determinedly introduced into international practice by the Soviet Union and the socialist countries. A part of this new strategy was the establishment of the so-called "parallel structures" to serve as a "fifth column of anticommunism in the socialist countries." Based on materials published in the West, we see that in the 1970s and early 1980s, Poland was to become the guinea pig for this strategy. Stated in simple terms, the reasons for this choice can be found in the economic and sociopolitical situation in Poland as it existed in the middle 1970s.

Anticommunist centrals observed very carefully the rising indebtedness of Poland in the West, the increasing linkage between the Polish economy and Western concerns, which made it dependent on imports of Western raw materials, spare parts, etc. Simultaneously, the situation in Polish agriculture (in 1979, more than 70 percent of the land was in the hands of private farmers), due to several bad harvests and faulty organizational work in agricultural production emanating from the lack of collectivization, was the reason that since the mid-1970s Poland became dependent on large quantities of grain deliveries from the hard-currency states, which made it even more vulnerable to political and economic pressures.

The party's serious mistakes in ideological and organizational work which led to its estrangement from the working people--along with the existence of a virtually independent Catholic Church which has been acting as an ideological second force in the state ever since the mid-1950s, led to a disruption of internal unity in the Polish nation. This too was well known to the anticommunist centrals. The awareness of these two factors was the reason why, since the mid-1970s, these centrals concentrated on Poland in a systematic manner.

Having learned from their defeats in Poland and Czechoslovakia in the 1960s, the anticommunist centrals came to the conclusion that antisocialist forces in the countries of the socialist community, which draw together merely a segment of the intelligentsia, do not have a sufficient base of sympathizers which would enable them to exert effective pressure and achieve their aims. For this reason, it was decided that the "parallel structures" should strive to gain influence at least on a part of the working class and religious believers.

A specific problem in Poland was to find a suitable slogan and program which would bring together not only the revisionist renegades formerly active within the PZPR who were infected by thoughts of "democratic socialism" and Trotskyism, but also part of the Catholic intellectuals closely cooperating with the episcopate, plus a small group of the traditionally antisocialist and antisoviet intelligentsia uncompromisingly oriented toward the restoration of a bourgeois republic in Poland. The needed slogan was found in the form of "defense of human and civil rights," based on a warped interpretation of the Helsinki Final Act. This enabled them to unite all antisocialist elements in a struggle against the communist party, against socialism in Poland. Each little group of the antisocialist forces was able to formulate its own long-term program, outline its own objectives which were to be realized only after the liquidation of the leading role of the PZPR and the destruction of socialism in Poland. The program of the counterrevolutionary forces was elaborated with direct participation of the ideological diversionist center of the Polish emigration in Paris, which is directed by the CIA. This center which publishes, among other things, the magazine KULTURA, made no secret of its ideological and practical participation in the preparation of this program. As early as 1975, this magazine published an article written by a certain Marian Kowalski in which the author states that "the most important, yet most overlooked, task of the emigration is the drafting of alternate political programs for the Poles," and that "in the formulation of programs intended for Poles at home and abroad, no one can replace the importance and influence of the emigres." A year later, 1 month before the establishment in Poland of the illegal counterrevolutionary organization KOR (Committee for Workers Defense), the same Paris magazine published a programmatic proclamation attributed to a fictitious organization called the Union of Polish Independence, containing clearly outlined aims and 26 specific demands. The KOR program cited in many articles subsequently published by its founders Michnik, Kuron, and Drawicz, is nothing but a paraphrase and adaptation to individual stages of the counterrevolution of the basic program "document" of the diversionary Kultura center. The "minimal" program of the counterrevolution was the establishment of the "parallel structures" independent of state control and a gradual "installation of pluralism without authorization." The maximum program (the so-called social outlook, as it was labeled by Michnik) was the step-by-step transformation--based on gradual institutionalization of the "parallel structures," of Poland into a parliamentary democracy of the "Finnish type," only loosely linked with the socialist community under the so-called recognition of Polish national priorities in the area of domestic and, to a great extent, foreign policy. This meant virtual implementation of what is contained 5 years later in the program of the union Solidarity.

Unity of the Counterrevolutionary Forces

All detachments of anticommunism have truly united toward the implementation of counterrevolutionary objectives in Poland, from the centrals of ideological diversion, emigres, renegades striving for the "third way" between capitalism and socialism, all the way to the Fourth Trotskyist International, and militant catholicism. They were joined in one goal, namely, the overthrow of socialism in Poland. Slogans of "independent unions," and "abolition of party monopoly," can be found in articles by Kuron and Michnik published in the emigre KULTURA, as well as on the pages of the Trotskyist magazine HORNET which, before its "return" to Poland, was edited by Edmund Balaka, but also in "pastoral letters" and resolutions of the Polish episcopate's conference as early as in 1976. The implementation of these aims has now been taken over by Solidarity, including the above-mentioned slogan of "parliamentary democracy."

In addition to the above-cited program, the second session of the Solidarity get-together, announced the termination of the activity of the so-called Committee for Workers Defense, KOR. Professor Lipinski who made the announcement in the name of KOR, stated that "Solidarity is KOR's heir." He thus expressed not only the direct link in the continuity of objectives of the two organizations, but also the fact that virtually all the objectives of the counterrevolution's minimum program, have been achieved in present-day Poland.

The Solidarity leadership has today fully adopted as its own the counterrevolutionary program of the antisocialist forces and its implementation. This program is not a program of the Polish workers, but a program of the foreign anticommunist centers and their lackeys among renegade intellectuals in Poland.

The programmatic "unity" on which all antisocialist groups agreed, also shows that the road from revisionism, reformism, socialism with a human face, to blatant anticommunism, is a short one. The initial minor "opinion concessions" soon turn into a fall into the ranks of enemies and open treason. This is demonstrated by the thinking processes of renegades like Kuron and Modzeiewski, onetime proponents of "democratic socialism" in Poland but, in the end, by our own experiences with renegades of the type of Pelikan, Mlynar, and others.

DOLEZAL COMMENT ON PRAGUE RADIO ATTACK AGAINST DISSIDENTS

Prague RUDE PRAVO in Czech 9 Dec 81 p 2

[Article by Vaclav Dolezal: "Second 'Talks from the Other Side'--What Wouldn't He Do for Dollars"]

> [Text] The second airing of "Talks from the Other Side" which was prepared by Czechoslovak Broadcasting (it was broadcast yesterday by the Hvezda station and will be repeated today, Wednesday, by the Prague station at 1745 hours) also included a number of authentic statements. Statements that were not intended for public presentation, statements voiced by leaders of emigre groups, so to say, confidentially among themselves.

Tigrid, who has been working for the American CIA espionage service ever since World War II, admits in one of his talks with Pelikan what generous presents he has just brought back with him from the United States. He was invited to make his transoceanic trip by his control organs hiding under the company label of International Advisory Council (IAC) led by American George Minden. The latter assigns him specific tasks. After his return, Tigris cynically boasted of having once again managed to "panhandle some goodies in New York," that he "really put the screws to Minden who has quite a bit of money" from which "a bit is dished out in all directions," to include the "mutual enterprise" run by Tigrid and Pelikan.

For this revelation of mutual contacts, as stated by the broadcast commentator, Mr Minden of IAC will probably have little praise for his agent.

However, Minden is not the only source of financial means for anti-Czechoslovak espionage and other anti-Czechoslovak activities. The CIA also uses other "middlemen" posing under entirely innocent cover names. These include, e.g., the Ford Foundation or Volkswagen Foundation, or various councils, associations and internationally awarded prizes. Through these front companies, the CIA finances the activities of Pelikan's emigre group and its venomous publications as well as Tigrid's group headquartered in Paris and its publications. The means of these emigre groups are then used to finance people who live in Czechoslovakia and who for one reason or another let themselves become recruited for cooperation with enemy centers.

The documents heard by listeners of "Talks from the Other Side" confirm that these traitorous activities are motivated primarily by greed. On Tigrid's authorization, a certain Corry visited two persons living in Czechoslovakia who openly let him know that "if he had brought money, that would have been something else again." "What a creep," Tigrid's wife, unburdening herself when referring to one of Tigrid's "collaborators" in Prague.

At any rate, money was carried to various addresses by that couple of French tourists whose automobile was intercepted on the Czechoslovak border this spring. That put into the hands of our authorities complete lists of these and similar people, to include conclusive materiel evidence of their hostile activities.

Emigre leaders right away looked for a scapegoat on whom to pin that debacle. They found a sacrificial lamb in emigre Kavan and decided to break up with him. As Tigrid said himself: "I'll kick him out, I'll fix his wagon. You know me, ...that's my specialty...."

As listeners of the second airing of "Talks from the Other Shore" found out, the latest "specialty" of Mr Tigrid is now--the working class. He was directed by his overseas providers to assess "Polish experiences" with the so-called Solidarity and their "applicability" to influencing the working class in Czechoslovakia. Tigrid, as a post-February refugee, has never forgotten the action of Czechoslovak workers against reactionary elements in February of 1948, has never had any compassion for the Czechoslovak working class. He also did not hide his disdain when he talked about it with Pelikan: "Well, otherwise I toil with that shitty working class. Well, I'm writing a book."

Let the readers forgive us for having taken the liberty of citing Tigrid's defamatory, insulting statement in all its authenticity. It is characterized by a typical vicious class hatred. Yet, Tigrid is writing a book about the working class he so detests. What would he not do for dollars.

CSSR WRITERS' UNION SENDS OPEN LETTER TO WESTERN WRITERS

[Text] Esteemed colleagues, the century whose end is approaching, is the most eventful period in the history of mankind. In the short span of a few decades, it has brought us discoveries and created values of which entire generations of our descendants will be proud as they enjoy their benefits. It brought freedom to many nations, raised in broad measure the dignity of man, and brought mankind the prospect of a previously unheard of happy life. Unfortunately, it also brought two world wars of which the second was even more terrible than the first, and spattered the planet with numerous conflagrations of military conflicts, violence, terror, and economic and social oppression. The dignity of people, their right to a happy and full life, often the right to life itself, have often been and still are threatened, sometimes denied them altogether. We recognize that the most horrible danger, incomparable with anything in the past, aimed against man is the threat of a new, nuclear this time, war. We recognize that while wars of the past could at times remain localized in certain parts of the world, a nuclear war would have an entirely different character, would inevitably enshroud the whole world, destroy all that nature and human toil had created over millenia, and threaten the very existence of mankind.

This fact is being increasingly more clearly understood by people of all continents as they ponder their and their children's future and the fate of their world. Especially among people of all European nations there is a growing and justified wave of revulsion and resistance against the threat of a war such as the history of mankind has never experienced, resistance against those who are feverishly preparing for it.

Not a single day goes by without the ruling circles of the United States of America providing growing evidence through their proclamations, as well as political, economic, and military measures, of their determination to manufacture and amass not only on their territory, but also in your countries and in areas thousands of miles removed from the United States, new, even more lethal, weapons of an aggressive character.

For us, Europeans, it is disturbing when American government spokesmen try to reassure and deceive the world by their assertion that a nuclear war could be limited in scope and, in a criminal and unrealistic manner, calculate that a nuclear conflict could be waged in Europe alone, thus sparing the very circles which would lead mankind into a nuclear disaster. We Europeans are angry and indignant to see these circles' willingness to sacrifice to their inhumane interests and intentions the values of old, cultured Europe and all that has been created in the course of history, including the lives of her inhabitants.

The mission of a writer, the mission of culture in our history has always been synonymous with humanism. We are and always wish to remain guardians of the heritage of Romain Rolland, Thomas Mann, Maxim Gorki, Martin Andersen-Nexo, and other great figures of world humanism. We march in the same ranks with millions of people who wish to preserve peace for themselves and their children and who opt in this fateful period for the alternative of life and prosperity against the alternative of nuclear death.

We still have enough work ahead of us on this planet in order to fulfill the vision of a happy life for all mankind.

While the classical sources of energy on our planet are inexorably nearing exhaustion, nuclear energy which could within a brief timespan become a giver of life and resolve this problem of mankind, is to be transformed into an instrument of destruction.

In our century, in an era of incredible scientific and technological progress, no man endowed with human conscience can forget that half of humanity is starving, that millions of mothers lack even a drop of milk for their children, that millions of people desperately need a piece of bread. It is the shame of the world that millions of people, deprived of all hope, are unable to apply their energy and working skills to the benefit of the human community, that there are millions of illiterates, and millions lack basic health care. At the same time, rich natural resources lie idle instead of feeding the hungry and providing a meaningful future for millions of hopeless, unfulfilled human lives.

We cannot ignore tha fact that technological progress creates a situation where clean water and air will become increasingly rare, where emissions and toxic waste accumulate and ecological problems have grown to enormous proportions which can only be dealt with on a global scale through dedicated international cooperation requiring immense scientific and technological effort and gigantic material and financial resources.

All these problems affecting all of humanity can be resolved; however, this would demand an effort and means which are beyond the capability of any one state alone. Yet, at this very time, the principal imperialist superpower, the United States of America, focuses its scientific research and technological development primarily on war preparations and production of increasingly lethal weaponry, thus fomenting an ever more costly arms race.

We are convinced that the attention of hundreds of millions must be focused on the truth, on the development of life, and on an effort to disperse the deceptive fog which conceals the truth of where the threat of death is coming from.

Esteemed colleagues, even though we live and create in different societies, even though our work reflects different views of society, we turn to you so that we might, in unity and in accordance with the Final Act of the Helsinki Conference, raise our voices against preparations for nuclear war. We need not necessarily agree on everything, but we are neighbors in one house, our only planet, and the fate of one of us depends on the other. The fate of this house we share depends on us all.

Together with masses of hundreds of millions of people craving peace, let us raise our voice and demand a halt to a new round of rearmament. Let us protest against the decision of the American administration on the production of the neutron bomb, and against their intention to place at any cost new American nuclear weapons on the territories of Western Europe. Let us together do all we possibly can toward a ban on weapons of mass destruction and let us together call for disarmament. Let us insist that all the most serious global problems be dealt with through negotiations. Let us devote all our creative power, energy and authority to the defense of this cause.

Let us not forget that the American hawks would prefer to see Europe become the principal area of a nuclear war, Europe, the cradle of a great and noble culture. Let us not forget that a possible nuclear attack would necessarily and justifiably bring about retaliation and catastrophic consequences for people of those nations from whose territories the rockets with nuclear warheads had been fired.

The great social importance of our work, esteemed colleagues, lies primarily in the strength of literature which has the power to rouse human conscience, courage and responsibility to awaken the yearning for a happy and productive life in even richer forms than heretofore, a yearning for understanding among peoples. To defend life and all its values is an inseparable part of our mission. Let then our work and our word as citizens become now and in the future a humanist voice of reason and conscience, a voice of the need for a free peaceful life of all nations and their mutual cooperation.

WRITER PRESENTS STUDY ON CENSORSHIP, FORBIDDEN LITERATURE

Budapest MOZGO VILAG in Hungarian No 8, Aug 81 pp 67-82

[Article by Akos Szilagyi: "The Literature of Sensual Temptation"]

[Text] The primary temptation of forbidden literature—judging from its effects--is neither political, nor moral, etc; it is, to a much greater extent, a sensual temptation, Unlike the political, moral, etc. effects of forbidden literature, this is a temptation which probably none of its readers can remain completely unaffected by. Except, of course, those of its "readers" who actually do the forbidding and who, by virtue of their position in the literary division of labor, from the outset are deprived of this precarious and ecstatic pleasure. For them reading is not only not forbidden, but is a duty which is an explicit requirement in their field of work; one of pure monotony and boredom. The prohibitors are just as bored with forbidden literature as pastry chefs are with their cakes. They are unable to find sensual pleasure even in their own prohibitions, for such a pleasure is not a one-time experience, it does not stem from their personal arbitrariness, nor is it something which in itself is gratifying. It is addressed and directed toward others, and is already in a finished form decided in accordance with predetermined spiritual points of view. The person of the prohibition is no more important here than that of a bureaucrat within the bureaucratic system. In European culture the symbolic figure in the center of this activity has been the censor. A censor may do his work with or without enthusiasm, he may be educated or ignorant, a sensitive soul or a witless harebrain--either way, he will still not be able to find sensual pleasure in his work, for such pleasures are not permissible. For him a literary work is not a "call for freedom"[1], but a call for the suppression of freedom. No one has ever met a happy censor! Fanatic censors, maybe, but their fanaticism is really nothing more than an organic inability to be happy. A fanatic is anything but happy. The ecstasy of fanaticism is prosaic and is completely spiritual in nature.

It is a universal rule--as I shall attempt to argue below--that forbidden spiritual products and objects, persons and ideas,which have been outcast and outlawed, develop an inherent and inevitable spiritual relationship with the prohibitors, and by necessity, a sensual bond with the suppressed. The ban, in a sense, doubles the subject to which it applies, by dividing it into a spiritual and a sensual "part". This connection, however, only deserves attention if the relationship behind it is not one of personal eccentricity, and if it is not just a mere action gratuite, but a socially recognized and valid rule, norm or institutional mechanism which aims to preserve, convey or extend the legitimacy of a given form of rule. Forbidden literature--as the concept suggests--is based on this type of prohibition, regardless whether the connection is conscious or not. The historically changing ideologies and mechanisms which have served to ban literature can only be explored by way of a thorough sociological analysis. The intent of this essay, however, is not to explore the differences among the various taboos of magic practices, or between the "index" of the Christian Church and the modern, secular censorship of the press. As an attempt to present a philosophical approach to the subject, its very aim is to stress the existing similarities and coincidences of substance, and its starting point is the present.

"Forbidden Literature" As Enticer and Demon

The sensual appeal of forbidden literature will continue to last as long there as there are things to ban, reasons for which to ban them, people to ban them for and people who want to ban them. Forbidden literature does not cease to exist just because from time to time certain works are included in it or excluded from it, depending on the changing spiritual views upon which the ban is based, or on the prohibitors' material interests. What is more, forbidden literature does not even have to be read for its sensual power to captivate and fill one with fear, just as a believer does not actually have to commit the sin of adultery to be tempted by its demonic appeal. It is enough for him to know that it exists and to fell dominated by it. For, among other things, the tempation lies in the very fact, that he cannot commit it, that he is forbidden to do it. The person who reads forbidden literature is--in a way--fornicating with literature. He commits the sin and--whether he admits it to himself or not--enjoys the fact that he is commiting it. In extreme cases, the reading of forbidden literature may also trigger remorse and feelings of guilt (not only in the religious, but also in the political sense); what is more,--at a certain level of narrow-mindedness--it may even end with confession (in the case of literature forbidden in the secular sense, this would be the equivalent of political denunciation). The point, however, is that as a result of the ban, literature takes on a demonic and enticing character, while its reader becomes a fornicator. (Naturally, this is merely a false mental reflection of the given symbolic rule's religious, political and ideological perversion.)

Inaccessibility, concealment and secrecy--all tend to slip an element of sensual excitement into reading forbidden literature. The original and traditional reader mentality, therefore, becomes inevitably aesthetic. As a result, originally unaesthetic subjects are being aesthetically transmitted into our consciousness. It is for this reason, that often after we have "taken possession" of the forbidden work we feel no satisfaction at all. After all, we are talking about works, politics, philosophy, morality and aret. The disappearance of a particular work's sensuality, however, does not for a moment put an end to the sensual appeal of forbidden literature as a whole, nor to the enjoyment of it itself. The reason for this is that the thing we enjoy is not the original content of the work, but its incidental and transient form; what we enjoy is the taste of the forbidden fruit, what is more the ban itself which banishes the work into the world of sinners. As a result of the ban, the forbidden part of literature becomes sensual, thus causing us to disregard all of its specific and unique characteristics and content. Forbidden literature is also a secret literature: it represents the after-life of living literature, which may appear both as a ghost and an enticer. Sometimes it frightens its victim, sometimes it fills him with plesant thrills. "Secret" is the word which perhaps best expresses the contradiction between the original content (and form) of forbidden literature and its incidental form (and content). For secret is "a universal sociological form which shows complete indifference toward its contents' meaning of value....Secrets provide a special position for those who harbor them, they behave purely as socialogically defined stimuli and are theoretically independent of the content which they protect". (Georg Simmel[2]) It is this type of secret which--in the mind of the reader--first awakens a literary work from its material dream; it is what makes the taboo exciting. At first, acceptance is aimed, even unintentionally, at this form of sensuality. Because just as sensual love is indifferent to the woman's individuality (age, appearance, morals, feelings) and is interested only in abstract womanhood[3], so is the reader of forbidden literature indifferent to the "individuality" of the writing, its own content and the "Project" which the work contains; he is interested only in the sensuality which lies in its negativity and which has been activated as a result of the ban.

This secondary aesthetic character, of course, does not constitute a new subject; it merely covers the original with a new layer, which is not intended to mean that the subject is dead from the outset, or that it is something which one can treat as he pleases. It is the manner of acceptance which becomes sensual, and it does so in such a way so that it causes no significant distortion in the subject itself. It simply enjoys the subject differently, perceiving it to be something different than what we see it to be. This is why we say that this secondary aesthetic character is transient both in the historical sense and from the point of view of individual acceptance. As soon as it wears off of the work it can easily lose all of its magic, because from that moment on the only way it can survive is by using the power of its own magic. As far as individual forbidden works are concerned, reading them constitutes continuous descration and profanation. The pleasure of getting a taste of the secret is followed by bitter mornings of disappointment. In these cases, too, the paradox of the "aesthetic state" remains valid. The sensual freshness of the forbidden work can only be preserved by pushing it aside. We forego reading it, in order to preserve its sensuality for ourselves for ever. By way of this platonic reader relationship, the sensuality of the forbidden work remains inexhaustible. It is true: the less of an actual reader he is, the more the potential reader of forbidden literature is exposed to temptation, for he must be satisfied with the sensual fantasies which he created about it, just as an adolescant or a monk must.

It is, therefore, not so much the work itself which the secret doubles, as it is our acceptance, our views and our relationship with that work. The secret changes the reader's position in his relationship with the work. A secret can only be shared, it turns the reader into an insider, it changes reading into a mysterious ritual which is advisable to be kept secret in front of others. It confronts, ostracizes and uplifts. Not only does the work become independent, it becomes fetishized and begins to wield a certain amount of power over the reader. In their relationship the work is the initiator. It flirts and teases until the unsuspecting reader loses his self-control, abandons his reticence and forgetting everything he had been taught in school, attacks the work with his senses keyed up with excitement.

Looking at it from this point of view, we cannot differentiate between works which are written with the knowledge that they will be banned, and works which--regardless of their original intent--are dragged into the community of forbidden literature as a result of existing social divisions between literature and culture. In other words, it does not make any difference whether a literary work is the "enticer" or the "victim" of the ban. In general, only a somewhat small--although undoubtedly the most militant--part of forbidden literature is comprised of "reflected" forbidden works, the subject, theme and self-consciousness of which stems from their opposition to the ban and from their daring contempt for, or derisive evasion of the ban. In such cases, instead of surrounding the work with an air of sensuality, the ban becomes the theme and the subject of the work, that is to say, it gives the work a double meaning.

Censorship and Index

This unique quality of forbidden literature which stems from the sensual appeal of the forbidden fruit and the demonic power of secrets, was cleverly described by Marx in one of his early works, entitled "Discussions on the Freedom of the Press": "In the country of censorship--he wrote--everything is forbidden, which means that printing an uncensored writing is considered a notable event. It is viewed as a martyr, and there can be no martyrs without glory and believers. It is considered an exception, which only adds to its value. Every mystery is captivating. Where public opinion is a mystery to itself, it is automatically captivated by any writing which formally breaks through the mystical barriers. Regardless whether they are good or bad, censorship turns all forbidden writings into extraordinary writings, while freedom of the press divests every writing of its materially impressive element"[4].

From the point of view of our inquire, therefore, the contrast between forbidden and non-forbidden literature should not be viewed in terms of "free" vs. "suppressed" literature, or "rebellious" vs. "subservient" literature or even as "censored" vs. "uncensored", but rather as "secret" v . "open" literature, as "sinful" and "mystical" literature vs. Moral and plain literature, as "diabolic" or "demonic" literature vs. "angelic" or even "saintly" literature, as "profane" vs. "formal" (usually religiously acquired) literature, and as sensual vs. spiritual literature. This point of view, however, is not intended to be forced onto anyone; it stems from the very nature of suppressed practices, and as such it is applicable not only to forbidden literature: "every suppressed practice or belief will have an inevitably profanizing outlook--even if they do not happen to intend to descrate--inasmuch as by virtue of their mere existance they question the monopoly of handling sacred matters that is, the legitimacy of the holders of this monopoly" (Pierre Bourdieu).[5]

This paradox connection (i. e., that the spiritual ban pertaining to the subject views that subject as a sensual one) can be clearly seen in the historically early forms of forbidden literature already; let us consider, for example, the differences between the apocryphal and canonized texts of the bible. Let us also not forget that it was Christianity which first treated sensuality as a principle: "it was Christianity that drove and purged sensuality from this world (....) Christianity was the first to spiritually define sensuality (S. Kierkegaard).[6] The reverse side of this is usually also true: everything which has been driven out or purged from this mortal world, having been found to be in contradiction with the principle of the spirit, returns from the other side in the form of sensual tempatation. Sensuality provides a way to defend and rebel against spiritual oppression. Since, however, sensuality feeds not on liberation but on oppression and suffering, it is a perverted kind of sensuality. What could demonstrate this better than the fact that it detaches itself from the spirit and stand in contradiction with it--it is a demonic sensuality, and abstract sensuality. It asserts itself as an independent force both towards those who impose the ban ond toward the world itself. When a literary work's strives for autonomy are suppressed, that autonomy assumes a distorted, negativistic form, as if it were meant to be a revenge, a kind of inevitable punishment for the imposing of the ban. The problem is that this also affects the literature, the work itself.

Incidentally, during the long centuries of the Christian Church's autocratic rule, this spiritual principle was manifested in a trancendence conveyed through belief, and starting from the bourgeois era, usually in a kind of quasi-transcendence conveyed through politics (i.e. moral and ideological Sollens, the Future Humanity, etc.) The relationship of this type of ideologies--i.e. the type which aims to place the entire practice under its control and which strives for autocratic rule--to literature (to the work, the author, the institution) is without exception a relationship between the subject and the means which it uses to express, popularize, advertise, etc. something. All attempts for autonomy are ruthlessly avenged as deviations and departures from the proper and normal.[7] But this is precisely what awaken literature to a sense of its autonomy. At first, the manifestation of this autonomy is still negative, taking on the form of sensual temptation. It is the ban imposed on it which makes it realize that it is not an instrument, that it is something different, and this sense of being something different fills it with pleasure.

For forbidden literature to exist, having an ideology that justifies the banning of such literature by itself is not enough; the ban can only become a separate spiritual principle, and can only be organized into an apparatus, if the ideology which it represents is still not quite natural or is not natural anymore, if it still has not been able to establish or has already lost its uniqueness and exclusiveness. Its absolute and eternal character--together with the world order which it has become identified with--becomes insecure and uncertain. Thus the sphere of forbidden literature could not become isolated in literature before--as in Europe, for example--the official apparatus of the Christian Church became isolated from the community of Christians, or--as in China--before the Imperial bureaucracy became separated from the communities of land. Regulation of the literary public (even if it is limited only to the caste of those who can read and write)[8], and the selection of works--according to some higher spiritual point of view--requires an ideologically and politically well-organized apparatus for administering the ban. It was the emergence of a "totalitarian" ideology and the consolidation of political power over individuals and social classes which provided the precondition for the Church and the imperial bureaucracy to become guardians of the symbolic order" in moments of danger, and to find their own, and by no means always symbolic, means to help them preserve that order. The reason for this was that in these societies upsetting the symbolic order carried with it the danger that it might lead directly to the disintegration of the entire social order. It was not out of spiritual "narrow-mindedness" that they reacted so sensitively to every ideological challange, but because safeguarding the symbolic order directly helped to preserve the political order, and with it the entire politically structuralized social form.[9]

The "Index Librorum Prohibitum" (the "Index of Forbidden Books") was first published in 1559, by pope Paul IV., in other words relatively late, some 100 years after the invention of the press. From time to time, of course, censorship had been used quite early in Europe against doctrines suspected of heresy. In 325, for example, they banned and destroyed the writings of Arius' disciples, the Arians. Also put to the flames were all of the writings of Arnold Bresciai. And lists of forbidden works, the so called catalogues, had existed well before the first index appeared. In 1515, Leo X. even had the offices of the Holy Officium, the Inquisition--a unique church police--taking part in the work of compiling these catalogues. He had made it the task of the Inquisition's special congregation of cardinals, to announce and implement the imposition of bans.[10] The spreading of printing merely made the imposing of bans better organized; in the final analysis, however, the activization of church censorship was not the result of this technical invention, but rather it came as a response to the various heretic movements, above all the Reformation, which brought the first major shock to the unity and external validity of that symbolic rule.

As the bourgeois spirit presented its challange, it also brought with it the emergence of secular censor bureaus (the first of which was established in 1486, on the orders of the prince-elector Berthold of Mainz). The old order was already on the defensive, although here and there it was still able to launch counter-attacks. The church, however, became increasingly less able to single-handedly manage the defense of the symbolic rule and the legitimization of its political power. Religious polemics were still kept within the pale of the Church, and only religious consciousness and organization were torn into pieces in their wake. It never even occured to anyone during these polemics, that the other side might have an earthly interest in arguing his "official" or "heretic" position; what was at stake, they thought, was finding "the" divine truth and the only interpretation of that truth which precludes all other possibilities. Heretic teaching--covertly or overtly--was itself striving for spiritual monopoly and absoluteness. From the 18th century on, however, these religious polemics gave way to political debates, which began to question not only the "mistakes" and "blunders" of those exercising the symbolic rule, and not just the "imperfections" of the official ideology, but the entire feudal-political system already. A new truth emerged: the "heretic" political teaching no longer asked to be placed before the same tribunal with its opponent; instead, it set up a new tribunal, the tribunal of reason. Criticisms of the Catholic religion and church gave way to a universal criticism of religion ("Ecrasez l'infane"), which was no longer just a kind of opposing religious trend or heresy within Christendom; instead; it became established as a universal philosophical criticism of the Church (i.e. the atheistic ideologies, demands to separate state and church, declaring religion to be a private matter, etc.)

Forbidden literature had never been richer or livelier than during the transitional period in which all of the forces that had a stake in overthrowing the existing feudal society were already in place, and when the old institutions were still able to keep them under control by outlawing, persecuting and imposing bans on their various manifestations and representatives. The narrow-mindedness, incompetence and even defenselessness of the old order's institutions of oppression in coping with the change lied precisely in their inability to go beyond imposing bans. "The ruling class no longer has faith in its ideology. It has assumed a defensive position; it does, to a certain extent, attempt to delay the spreading of new ideas, but it is unable to do anything to stop them without itself becoming imbued with them. It has recognized that the best instruments for building up its rule are its own religious and political principles, but since it views them merely as instruments, it does not have complete faith in them anymore; as a result, the revealed truth has become displaced by a pragmatic truth. Although censorship and suppression have become more visible, they hide secret weaknesses and desperate cynicism."[11] The reason for this was that instead of ending or undermining it, the imposition of bans intensified and multiplied the effectiveness of these new efforts. It confronted them with the spirit and the order which it was protecting, in other words, it placed that spirit and order into a relative position, it helped shape its opponent's self-awareness, increase its independence and outline its goals. This mode of defense, however, even if temporarily, can only be effective in a society in which the safeguarding of the symbolic order is directly contributed to the preservation of the political system--i.e. of a society founded on coercion and force--in other words, in which social rule is based not on material, but on personal, ideological and political foundations.

Destruction, Revival

As a result of the bourgeois transformation, the individual, the various social groups and clssses gradually broke out of the universe of the closed ideology--that was so jealously protective of its own purity and monopoly--which they had been locked into by the long centuries of European feudalism. The poetry of the bourgeois revolution called for equality, fraternity and liberty, while the prose of bourgeois life went on to separate ideas, people and their conditions of existence, viewing them as unrelated concepts. It, however, also secularized and profaned all spheres of political and ideological life, which previously had been united by religion under the control of the Church bureaucracy. Although at a rate and in a manner which differed from country to country, forbidden literature itself was beginning to lose ground and fade away. In a bourgeois society interwoven with liberal political practices, the screening of ideas is not something which is primarily and directly ideological in nature, it is not decided on the basis of views advocated by some special autocratic ideology; literature is not controlled by the use of certain ideas or political means, just as it is not compelled directly to adopt a given subject or form.

In a developed bourgeois society power does not manifest itself in the political forms of personal dependence, and it does not accumulate on the side of the symbolic rule; instead, it becomes an independent material force supported by an economy that had found its independence under capitalism, and as such it places itself above personal relations and above all of the ideological, moral and political objectives of individuals, groups and classes. The precondition for this unparalleled personal, political and ideological autonomy, which here is used to describe the movement, self-organization and self-expression of individuals as well as social groups and classes, is the autonomy of capital. This, however, ruthlessly subordinates all spiritual, political and personal autonomies: it makes them formal, although by no means gratuitious or purposeless. Thus, while in the realm of ideas this is a most colorful and lively period (a period branded by conservative critics as "chaos", "disorder" and "decline", and celebrated by liberal apologetics as "pluralism" and "true freedom of expression"), in everyday life it is the somber logic of material power which prevails--but not in the form of an ideology, nor as a spiritual mediator between people and people, and people and objects. It does not subjugate the universal order as new ideas should; instead, projecting itself as the universal order and the natural state of affairs, it procedes to subjugate those ideas as things which--while nice, perhaps,--are somewhat useless and which, therefore, are not to be taken quite seriously. Capital does not present itself as a "God" or a "tyrant", who must be driven from throne but as nature itself. Ideologically, there are just as few restrictions on obtaining capital as there are on breathing through one's nose, and it is virtually just as impossible for everyone to get some, as it is to avoid death and continue living. "Bourgeois ethics"--wrote Sarte--"do not emanate from Providence: their universal and abstract rules are materially defined; they are not products of an all-powerful congenial will, rather, they resemble physical laws which have not yet been defined."[12]

This new form of subjugation is certainly neither ideological, nor political: it cannot be personified, it cannot be tied to any special ideological slogans, it cannot be traced back to tyranny or political interests and it cannot be blamed on any "ideals", "persons", 'doctrines" or "parties".

Bourgeois society has not eliminated subjugation itself, only the type of subjugation which is based on ideology and politics.[13] The concensus of the bourgeois society has been voiced by the very ideology, which--at least from the point of view of its ideals--has traditionally advocated the freedom of all ideologies, beliefs, convictions and political views: liberalism.[14] It, however, does not recognize the synthetic relationships either, between reality and ideas or between one group of ideas and another. Its "pluralism" refers to the atomization and coexistance of ideas, principles and persons.

Only a society which no longer has to rely on political and ideological--i.e. force and propaganda--methods to "eliminate" this social power which has come to assert itself as a material power, but which instead has matured, in every respect, to the point where it can replace material and state rule with direct rule by individuals and social groups, and production for profit with production to meet needs only such a society can hope to rise above this, in recent history unique and dualistic structure, which while being more favorable from the point of view of spiritual freedom, is less congenial from the standpoint of material power.

As long, however, as the overthrow of capitalist rule, the "retaking" of social power which has so alienated itself, can only be accomplished by political means, in other words, as long as the domination of persons over persons cements into a political power, a state form over people, eliminating all remnants of the autonomous self-organization of social groups and classes (as elements of the old dualistic organization which have outlived their usefullness), the establishment of monolithic and monopolistic political and ideological power will continue to be unavoidable, as will the development of a closed ideological universe, which while patiently or impatiently does tolerate other ideologies, can never give up its superiority or abandon its rightful claim to the absolute truth which it is willing to share with no one. Without an ideology it could not be what it should be right from the start, and it could not accomplish all the things which--in place of, and in opposition to capital--it has undertaken with the combined eagerness of all who have fallen behind.

Despite all its efforts, of course, the "truth" can never conform precisely to the ideology, just as there can never be an exact correspondence between economic realities and political demands. The traditional political means of regulating, restricting and banning the "truth" begin to reassert themselves. Among other things, this leads to a resurfacing of "approved" and "forbidden" literature, "authorized" and "unauthorized" authors (and even readers!); in literature, we begin to see a conflict emerging between the "official" and the "unofficial" spirit; a whole line of works and authors become blacklisted; libraries become decimated (while at the same time private libraries are decimated by fear); a part of these banned works are retained as "reserve books"; publishers and periodicals are placed under central control; foreign publications are strictly screened and undesirable works are withheld; the past becomes subjected to a process of ideological selection, and limits are established to restrict public exchanges of views and public thinking regarding the present as well as the future.[15]

Removal of the persistently recurring "past" (that is, from now on: the present) continues, and so does the constant purging of the truth of its perplexing elements that are in contradiction with the official spirit. "Really old garbage" (Marx), which tends to inevitably accumulate day after day, must be cleared away.[16] It would put the present which has now become immaculate, in a bad light, and especially: it would make the present relative and comparable to something else, putting it into a time frame--and not even in the time frame of the story of salvation--and eventually it would be impossible to bring it under control. In its old, misguided way it would again begin to show signs of independence and resistance. Ideas, books, archives, as well as institutions, parties, persons and sometimes even entire social classes end up in this "garbage dump". Hauling them there is taking on increasingly incredible dimensions, and in the final analysis it does not solve anything. The "garbage" can be collected, stored and burned (pardon the frivolous comparison!), but the "garbage dump" itself cannot be hauled away, the reaccumulation of "garbage" cannot be prevented and the "garbage men" gradually become more and more independent and thus will have a direct stake themselves in seeing to it that the accumulation of "garbage" continues.

But why does this will, which is striving so hard for the truth, demand a completely new and blank page in history, why does it want to "put a dash" between the past and the present, and why does it try so hard to present itself in every respect as the new truth whose time has already arrived? Because without doing so it would become impossible to create the kind of unprecedented concentration of political power--aiming at and drawing its legitimacy from the future--which alone can insure modernization--excluding capital and with it all of the self-regulating mechanisms of a "padded" economy and progressing at an accelerated rate--in the backward and underdeveloped nations of the "second" and "third" world. Only this (explanation) can enable us to really understand why the historical beginnings of socialism have taken the form of state-socialism, and why socialism has commenced in the East; developments, which naturally have added new contradictions to the already existing contradictions between capital and labor, and which to this day have defined, stiffened and retarded the only possible way of world-historical development which can reunite the goals of democracy and socialism. The beginning--from the point of view of the historical destiny of socialism--is laden with the burden of allowing some unfortunate and terrible possibilities to materialize; this, however, is hardly anything optional. This is the only way to break through the net of increasingly disadvantageous determinations.[17] The reason and purpose behind the emergence of the late feudal state was to become the first testing ground for the strategy of state-accelerated closing-up--east of the Elba (enlightened absolutism, the czarist bureaucratic state, the Prussian way, etc.). The inevitability of the beginning, however, is not in itself inconsistent with having alternatives to select from during the beginning. While from the point of view of historical philosophy it is perhaps unimportant whether early, or "raw" communism, or as we have historically come to know it, state-socialism, is "despotic" or "democratic"[18], it is not so when we look at it from the point of view of those who make up history, the specific individuals themselves. And when we come right down to it, it is not negligible when it comes to a choice between development or rigidity either. It is not unimportant whether the supremacy of the state is based on terror or on a concensus steming from hegemony; neither is it immaterial to note what dimensions its supremacy will take, to what extent it can permit the forming of autonomous interests, and in general, how it is able to relate to all of this and how it views itself and its own historical role. It is not at all a matter of indifference whether it can make its subjects to celebrate their losses of freedom as the realization of "real" freedom, or whether it reinforces its own oppressive nature in their mind, thus allowing room for schizophrenia that results from such a situation to spread, while fighting against itself, or at least tolerating the autonomous movements of society.

But let us, for another little while, get back to that "happy" state, where "forbidden literature" unnoticably passed away. Is it really so great that it died.

Publicity Device

Capital turns even literature into an enterprise. It cares only about one thing: the literature business must be profitable. The system of everything-is-for-sale engulfs literature, too, and this system--even if not in a spiritual, in a grossly material sense--is itself monolithic: it strives for exclusiveness and parades as the absolute world system. From here on, however, it is no longer a unified political and ideological power that subordinates and engulfs social life as a whole, which regulates or limits literary production, but the totally impersonal and--from the political, ideological and moral point of view--completely "unprincipled" and "idealess" power of the market-commodity concept. Naturally, this power also has its own unique political legitimacy, and it also has its own ideologies of self-defense and offense[19], but it is very well off without them, it gets along with anything as long as the attacks and challanges to its legitimacy are kept on a spiritual level and stop short of actually tempering with it. It can go as far as to take radically anti-capitalist literature that rebels against it and turn it into a commodity, as long as there is demand for it on the literary market. The reverse of this is also true: the profit-logic of the enterprise will refuse to defend even the most sophisticated apologetic literature, if it does not sell. The enterpreneur's involvement in the dissemination of literature is based not on ideological, but on business interests. Capital-praising literature, if it is unmarketable, does not generate any capital; instead, it leads to bankruptcy.

In a market which is subordinated to the logic of capital, the only elements capable of suspending business considerations are political organizations, state institutions, private foundations pursuing their own goals, which are maintained from other capitalist ventures, In this sense, the various organizations of propaganda, ideological education, manipulation, and finally, research can attain a certain degree of independence from the market, but at the same time they become dependent on their clients, supporters and sponsors.

As we have just seen, the entrepreneur's interest in literature is based not on literary, ideological or political, but on business considerations. He could also invest his money elsewhere, and would do just that if the literature business were not profitable. If it helps to increase his capital, he has no reason to be concerned about it, and if it does not bring in any profit, he has no reason to support it. His personal reservations, moral doubts or political affiliations vis a vis a particular work are private matters, which have nothing to do with business. A rich publisher, of course, is able to afford to do many things; he may patronize certain authors, he may lend his support to certain spiritual and political trends (while dropping others), he may also publish works that are not especially profitable, but the financial means necessary to do this, again, could only come from his own capitalist undertakings. Standing up against the large, monopolistically structured publishers, daily papers, and less often periodicals, breaking their market--and, of course, at a certain point--spiritual terror, is not merely a question of moral courage and new ideas (these could be engulfed and "integrated" within moments by the attacked side itself); it is a question, first of all, of capital strength and competitiveness, as demonstrated by the case of the tragic-fated, progressive Italian publisher, Feltrinelli.

From this point on, the limits of free speech seem to take the form of purely material and financial restrictions, which is an indication that the idiocy of "unprincipled" and "idealess" things is very much complex: it is "tolerant" toward "principles" and "ideas", and is definitely in support of "pluralism"; there is only one "tiny little" thing in which it does not tolerate any opposition; and this thing is called: financial profit. This new bourgeois publicness, as manifested in literature, is no longer subjected to spiritual censorship; it, however, is subjected to material censorship which compared to the former, is much more complete, much better refined and much more incomprehensible and unassailable. Money is the protagonist of the capitalist society. Restrictions on obtaining it are not personal, political or ideological; instead, they are "economic" and material restrictions, restrictions resulting from private property. These restrictions seem to assert themselves as the natural laws of human existence, which no turbulance, back-talk, denunciation, ridicule and criticism can ever overthrow or undermine. Spiritually, these natural laws are conveyed and confirming is all any ideology can do, even those, which from the point of view of their content are aimed precisely at denuncing, criticising and contesting these natural laws. On a territory dominated by the material power of a "well-padded" independent economy, the direct power-constituting and power-shattering effects of spiritual manifestations, as well as their counter-power, which has been virtually the equivalent of direct action, comes to an end. The bourgeois writer of the 20th century, who is now "free to do anything: romantically longs for the return of the "bad old times", when liberal writing was still facing suppression and restrictions: "A spiritual creation in those days were considered doubly significant, for it expressed ideas that gave rise to social upheavals, while at the same time also placing its author in danger." (J.P. Sarte)[20] On the territory of material rule, literature has lost its once-enjoyed power. The system of political and spiritual oppression, the system of personal dependence which itself was either helping to preserve, or aiming to destabilize indirectly.

Even radical anti-capitalist ideologies--precisely because they are "only" spiritual manifestations--can do nothing more than convey these non-ideological domains and to regenerate the system of material dependence. They do this primarily by virtue of their mere existence, because they tend to emphasize the quasi-spiritual graniosity of capitalist power, its "tolerance toward political and ideological matters, as well as its "pluralism". This fact indeed becomes an argument in the various ideologies which defend the system and which, of course, neglect to explain the real relationship between actual and spiritual power. Second, the circumstances under which it must strive to attain spiritual influence leave it with no other choice than to go out into the market and start looking for buyers. Thus, while it is fighting against the private ownership-based system of business enterprise, in reality it becomes its prisoner itself: it turns into a business enterprise. Spiritually, therefore, it is forced to help legitimize the capitalist relationship, and in practice, to accept and reproduce the capitalist logic. Even though compared to the world of feudal personal and ideological dependence or isolation this can indeed be considered freedom, the question arises: "Can a press that has stooped to becoming an industry be considered faithful to its character: does it act in accordance with its noble nature; is such a press really free? A writer must certainly earn in order to exist and to be able to write, but he should under no circumstances exist and write in order to earn." (Marx)[21]

As the capitalist society, in which all human relations are subjected to an alienated economy, but in which no one has control over that economy, grows increasingly stronger, literature which had been subjected to spiritual--religious and political--censorship, i.e. forbidden literature, begins to gradually lose ground giving way to "free" literature which is subjected to material censorship. As this occurs, "forbidden literature" itself becomes a business, a good investment. We are talking not only about pornography, but in general, about uncovering and making public secrets and mysteries which the bourgeois press attaches such great importance to (publication of secret documents and correspondence, the airing of intimacies, etc.). Naturally, actual censorship, literary persecution, seizing of works and prosecution of authors are resorted to only in extraordinary cases, depending on the extent to which feudal-ecclesiastic institutions have continued to assert themselves and on the manner in which their role has continued to manifest itself in a particular country[22], and even then they are only publicity moves, and at times provoked and only imitated procedures designed to turn a work into marketable work, and occasionally, the author into a martyr. (Here we will not deal with the capitalism of fascist-type totalitarian states, for it is a separate and complex subject, one which from the point of view of bourgeois development as a whole is merely an "interlude", representing the "exception" rather than the "rule". Literature, of course, may "ban itself", once it loses its patience with this newly found freedom: it may withdraw and exclude itself from market-controlled literature, it may decide to break with it, it may choose to rebel, shock, disgust, etc. There has, however, never been an outcast, outlawed, self-exiled or underground literature, that would have been able to find its way out of the market's binding hold, and avoid the fate of sooner or later turning into a business venture. The very thing that has eventually turned it into such a venture has been its rebelling stance against the omnipotence of the market and its goods. The monetary sensuality of scandal, self-exclusion, self-ban and rebellion is only good for giving a little boost to market demand (sometimes, of course, it is a pre-planned, consciously employed publicity device). The publicity image of the "forbidden fruit" turns even inedible foods into edible ones. The literature of the bourgeois era, therefore, does not get to enjoy the questionable joy of possessing the sensual appeal of a forbidden fruit; at best, its destructive force is used as a publicity device. In the new, bourgeois culture the place of forbidden literature is taken not by the literature of Negativity, the Great Negation, but the literature which from the point of view of business is simply uninteresting and unfit to publish (because it is unsalable or is losing money).

As far as the sensuality of rebellion is concerned--"non olet": money has no odor. But it is not only the human nose which is unable to sense the odor of money; money is similarly insensitive to the odor of human matters. It does not have the slightest intention to dwell on the political, moral and artistic content of "underground" literature and make faces with its nose up in the air. Business, is business. And from this point of view there is only one thing that matters: how much, where, and what can be sold most rapidly and with the greatest efficiency on the market.

Anachronism and Coercion

The literature of sensual temptation reappears again in those anti-capitalist societies, which must still resort to state rule and political and ideological force to break, and more or less replace the power of capital. In these societies aggregate power is once again the sum of purely political and ideological factors. Consequently, the criteria which they establish limiting the freedom of spiritual activities and the functioning of the social public and of the various political institutions, are once again contextually and spiritually motivated, in contrast with the--spiritually and qualitatively--insensitive criterium of profitability. This, however, is not necessarily an unequivocal step forward in all cases, since this new spiritual and political dependence, the political and ideological supremacy of the state, the lack of autonomous social organization continue to carry with them the possibility of establishing new relations of power--similar to those of pre-capitalist societies--imposing irrational restrictions and allowing new inhumanities to take their toll. And today we know very well: these are not just possibilities! The danger is especially great, that in those anti-capitalist societies which are founded on this policy, the political and ideological state will use these new qualitative and spiritual criteria against various people and social groups, and--claiming to act in the name of the common interest!--it simply equates itself with that society. It may restrict, eliminate, destroy, persecute every spiritual manifestation, institution and organization which emphasize dissimilarity, diversity and duality; in other words, non-uniformity even if they do so involuntarily, by virtue of their mere existence.

But we can agree--taking it out of the context of historical movements that have occured until now, and separate from the network of mutually reinforcing and traversing economic (the "second and third world"), political (traditions, imitation models, catch-up strategies) and military (influence zones, the geographic situation) forms of coercion--,so once again, can we agree with those who already claim to see the horrible features of a new post-capitalist civilization making their mark on our admittedly distorted present? Why would "under-development" point to the future instead of the past? Just because the new society is one which ideologically is aimed at the future? Does that mean, therefore, that we must also equate it with its own ideology? In reality, the danger is much more real that--due to the fact that these material and spiritual preconditions are lacking--there could be a forced (and, of course, not simple!) return to pre-capitalist forms. These horrible features identified mistakenly as "new" and "forthcoming", are actually nothing more than atavisms and anachronisms, which can be consistently observed even in the non-discredited past of these societies. None of this, however, is going to make the prospect of a frightening union between the past and the future more comforting, especially when we are faced with the consequences of these anachronisms which at times can be catastrophic. After all, it is not all the same whether we equate it with the nature of the new civilization, or whether we see it as the embodiment of the economic and cultural immaturity of that new civilization, imbeded in the paradigm of a coerced "third-road" direction of development.[23] For this will detemmine our relationship with the established order and the image of our own future.

The old thesis is reconfirmed: No social formation can ever disappear until all of the productive forces have evolved which can never be replaced by newer and more advanced production relations that would allow it more sufficient breathing room, and until their conditions of material existence are fully developed in the womb of the old society itself.[24] The problem is, that in the paradigm of "third-road" forms of development that results from unequal progress[25], their very aim--at least that of the various political movements which subscribe to the ideology of Marxian socialism--is to place these conditions of material existence onto a political foundation and to do so already within the--purely political guaranteed--framework of the new society itself. Based purely on political (force, coercion) and ideological foundations (propaganda, faith, fanaticism and heroic sentiments), however, this can only begin, at best, but can never be carried through, for no amount of will and sentiment can spare people from the fate of feeling compelled to produce the material conditions of the new society first. Consequently, they become increasingly forced to work within their own politically guaranteed limits--as if acting as a test-tube, artificially--trying to recreate the womb of the old system, and use it--presuming that they recognize in time the difference between what they are actually able, and what they want to achieve--as a kind of "incubator".[26] This, however, does not reduce their inner contradictions; it merely provides them with a new form of movement and a prospect for their release.

The pre-socialist tasks of "original stockpiling" and industrialization--in addition to the disconnection of the economy's "self-regulating" mechanisms, and to the conditions of breaking out of the capitalist world market--could only be carried out by a state which represented the entire society. Spiritually this led it to try to abridge the gap between its social goals, economic tasks and ideals, and reality using ideology: it forced the chaotic, dynamic and "impure" reality under the universe of a single, closed and unified ideology. Only this kind of ideology, and only a coercive apparatus which totalizes that ideology directly extending it over the whole of reality, could lead people to accept, and convince them to view the non-existent as existent and the existent as "non-existent". All spiritual manifestations (from gestures and mimics to political jokes, and from political platforms to artistic styles), which did not belong to this universe or pose a threat to its homogeneity from the inside, suddenly became invalid, damaging and hostile. And they were all handled and treated accordingly. This anachronism--as I already pointed out--did not stem from the mental infatuation, foolishness and impatience of any particular person or group; instead, it stemmed from the nature of state socialism, that is, from the fact that the realization of socialism as a form of political society occured not in a democratic, but in a despotic political system. Of course, in a society "imbeded" in politics, the role of individuals becomes immensly and dangerously more important, however, instead of pursuing their own personal ideas, they follow the logic--which is, of course, also intertwined with their interests--of one of the various types of political society. The life of societies organized in this manner was imbued with conservative ethos, the self-discipline of concensus was replaced by the iron discipline of terror, the avant-guarde of professional revolutionaries was succeeded by a caste of bureaucrats (thus giving life to the most oppressive form of the political possibilities presented by enlightened avant-guardism), and the legal process of natural leader selection was supplanted by a uniform process of charismatic and traditional selection of the unfittest.

This ideologically overexaggerated monolitism--as we know--is "nothing more than a misconception of the conceited mind, which holds that within the limits it had outlined, history will come to an end, and future events can be nothing more than mere reproductions of the concepts of a unique but absolutely alienated center" (Fuad Muhic).[27] Although it is a misconception, it is one which actively strives for realization. The reason for this is that following the overthrow of material power, ideology and politics become the most materialistic movements in the social world. And it is a fact that an idea which has become materialized and is striving for realization, behaves differently from "idealess" and "senseless" material, i.e. from matter itself. The moment "spirit" becomes combined with practice, the dispassionate apathy which matter has displayed toward all spiritual manifestations, every ideology, faith and conviction comes to an end. Since it is mot matter but spirit, since it is not objective but subjective and since it is not a quantity but a quality--it cannot exist without appreciating the human world, and it cannot do without choices, priorities or "biases": it must state, negate, challange, attract and dismiss. Whenever it is the "spirit" which begins to build new forms of practice, it always seems "more impatient" and "more restricted" in doing so than "matter". The reason for this is that from its point of view it really does matter what it decices to accept or reject, what its choices are and why, and how and according to what values it goes about sorting out the truth. It must reject or subordinate all values and criteria which recognize only one--a purely quantitative--determination as being of any importance: what can be turned into profit and how much of it can be made. However, this is precisely where the "weak point" of these new forms of practice lies: the greater the distance is between the "spirit" and the "truth", between the prescribed goals and the given possibilities, and the more completely and the more one-sidedly the "spirit" is able to subordinate the whole of the real world, the more tragic its potential consequences are going to be. It is under these kinds of circumstances that the "spirit" begins to portray itself as the starting point of the truth, a divine creative principle, a perfect and pure idea which can never be challenged by the facts. It violates the truth; it is intolerant toward all other spiritual versions of it which stand in contradiction with its own, and "perceiving" them as "false" spiritual views it strives to eliminate them; as the final step, it takes the new quality criteria and the new standard, and connects them with a tiny "elite", i.e. to the state, portrayed as the subject of the universal interest.

It is here, where one of the great internal contradictions of spiritually founded forms of practice lies; however, only certain historical situations and social preconditions can bring it into light and demonstrate its logical inconsistency. There is, however, no other choice: it either realizes that it is not and can never become one with the truth (and that if it could, it would have horrible consequences), or it will perish. In order for it to become one with the truth it would have to destroy it first, and by the time it would realize that it is holding a corpse, it would be too late already, for it itself would disintegrate under the impact of the resulting catastrophy. But this contradiction might also have a different end: the truth could force it to renounce its statism and its intolerance (while not abandoning its independence and freedom); to place the spiritual wealth and pluralism of actual forms of practice in the center of its set of values, instead of the terror of the pure and self-elated spirit; to affirm and help attain the autonomy of the subject in every human being and social group, to identify with it and to tolerate all differences, dissimilarities and contrasts which were so unimportant during the era of capitalist material rule, and which are to become so vastly important in spiritually conveyed forms of practice.

It does not hurt sometimes to ask ourselves how the founders of "scientific socialism" would have felt, and how they would have acted in a, one might say, corporative society[28] which has adopted their ideology, but which instead of "refunctioning" the bourgeois freedom and helping formal freedoms to evolve into material freedoms, has simply destroyed them. This comes to mind especially when we think about the never-ceasing moral struggle which they had to wage to preserve their own personal integrity, their spiritual and political independence against the movement, and the movement's apparatus, the party. For they themselves never became party-men and never perceived the movement in terms of its narrow, political interpretation; they are not whom we would consider the "martyr", the "fanatic" or the "bureaucratic" activist-type.

"Dependence, even on a workers' party, is a bitter fate"--wrote Engels in a letter to A. Babel.--" Aside from the question of money, it is an unfortunate position to be in for anyone who has initiative to be the editor of a paper which belongs to the party. Marx and I have agreed from the start, that we could never accept such a job, and that the only kind of paper we can have is one which is financially independent even from the party itself. 'Nationalization' of your press may have its disadvanaages if it is carried too far. It is imperative to have a press within your party which does not depend directly on the presidium or even the congress, in other words, one which is freely able to form and opposition to challenge certain party measures within the program and the accepted tactics, and staying within the bounds of its party functions, to freely criticize even the program and the tactics themselves. You, as the presidium of the party, must support and even call for the creation of such a press; this way your moral influence on it will still be greater than if it became established partly against your will."[29] The reason, of course, that these reservations and objections are considerable is not because they came from Engels, but because they are both true and timely. Furthermore, these lines do not even apply to the way and entire society's political life and news-reading public is structured; they refer only to conditions within the party. What has subsequently ensued and happened to us since then has been--almost as if it were meant to be a continuation of Engels' letter, using a tone of concern and inner criticism--wittily summed up in a short aphorism by Brecht: "When a state suppresses anti-state literature, it is actually damaging the literature which represents the state interest, by depriving it of its voice, its teeth and its objectivity."[30]

But the statist notion of literary freedom, according to which the state has the right to do anything, while the only thing literature may do is to become one with that ideology, was alien not only to Engels and Brecht, but also to the first democratic-minded ideologists of the forced state-socialist beginning. This is how Lunacharskiy felt about censorship even during the bloodiest period of the Civil War: "Those who say that we need censorship to prevent publication of even some great artistic works, if they are clearly of a counterrevolutionary tendency; those who say that we must select to ensure that the most necessary works are published before works that are undeniably useful, but rank only as third or even fourth in importance, will be proven right. Those, however, who say: 'forget all these preconceived ideas demanding freedom of speech'; or what 'our communist system calls for state censorship of literature'; or that 'censorship is not merely a terrible feature of a temporary era, but an inseparable part of our consolidated, socialized socialist way of life'; those who conclude that criticism should become a kind of unique denunciation, or that all literary works should conform to the same revolutionary standard, are the kind who, when scratched under the communist surface, will turn out to be dyerzhimordas [unyielding people], who having gotten their hands on a little power, suddenly believe they can act arbitrarily, talk big, and mainly that they can harass and ban."[31] Later, under the conditions of the NEP-type of state socialism, when the state still had not completely extended its control over the entire economic, cultural and political life, when it still had not eliminated the various degrees of independence among the various organs representing society's interests, and when it did not need to have complete uniformity ider in ideology or in spiritual life in general, nor did it feel compelled to control everything from above, literary life was practically bursting with energy. A whole line of autonomously controlled literary organizations were established, each having its own, separate periodical, and sometimes even its own publisher;[32] in addition to the state publishers, one after the other, new cooperative book-publishers began to appear; there was also a revival in private book publishing;[33] even some of the more important memoirs of White emigrants that had appeared in the West were published, as were the works of Russian writers living in the West; during the early 1920's, even the Smenohevist movement was granted its own periodical, (i.e. the story of NOVAIA ROSSIYA), and all attempts aimed at imposing the dictatorship of a single group of school of thought on literature were driven back. When, however, from 1929 this policy which has striven for "civil peace", concensus, consolidation and control by economic means was replaced by a new modernized form of "war communism" the state declared war on the entire "civil" (in Russia, at that time, primarily peasant) society, and using practically civil-war methods, it proceeded to eliminate even that little remaining autonomy which it had come to enjoy as a result of the socialist revolution (i.e. the nationalization of the trade unions, the atrophy of the Soviets, the dictatorship of the Secretariat and later of the Secretary, etc.).

To what extent this was avoidable or unavoidable, how much of it was attributable to ideology, to the Eastern way of social development to the political organization of the party, to external--military and economic--challenges, and to personnel changes, will continue to be a subject of debate, an open question for a long time to come. It is a fact, however, that things which during the Civil War period had been considered extraordinary and terribly coercive, became the law and the normal state of affairs in the society which was "consolidated" through the use of terror under state socialism. Eventually, the forcible merging of state and society led to the elimination of all differences of interest that had separated citizenship from class-membership and private interests, which destroyed both the mechanisms of economic--market--regulation and the possibilities of self-management, that is to say, both the essential organizational forms of the still unsurpassable past, and the new forms of the future which is still to be attained.

From that point on, ideology was used to conceal various equation or substitution processes (i.e. general secretary-class, or state-party-people), to substantiate the various evidence supporting it and even prove its progressiveness and superiority, in other words, to help directly to preserve this new political society. It is at this point and for this reason, that ideology becomes a matter of life or death, and it is indeed true: even the smallest crack, split or ambiguity will put a social system built in this manner itself in danger. Today it does not take any kind of special insight or audicity anymore to recognize: this homogenous, static ideology which had uniformly combined and subjected every sphere of the social consciousness and practice, was in every respect a negation of Marx's ideology.

In the light of an ideology which strives for homogeneity and absolute rule, all "differences", all "departures" and all "contradictions" are portrayed and handled as social deviations. In effect, it is the challenge of autonomy, of independent existence, which it considers to be the most catastrophic in all of this, and it is undoubtedly correct in assuming that even in the most harmless "departure" or "difference" there is a temptation of autonomy. However, since it is essentially a spiritual definition, which--and this is where its danger lies--has very real practical requirements and manifestations, by negating, banning, excluding and condemning them it takes the objects of its negation and turns them into sensual objects. Everything that finds itself face to face with this closed, homogenous spiritual universe, will, just by virtue of its opposition, acquire a sensual power: it becomes demonized. It is most significant, that the homogenous ideology itself acknowledges this transformation (incidentally, it acknowledges many things, all we need to do is pay attention!) when in its interpretations it paints a consistently demonic image of both its imaginary and real opposition: it is a constantly tempting, constantly luring, satanic power, or one which has a pact with the devil. This is precisely why it is so dangerous; for instead of affecting our spirit, it appeals to our base senses, and because it "contaminates" us, it "works itself into our heart" and "occupies" our body without us even realizing it or being able to resist it, since secretly we are attracted to it, we want it and enjoy it. We want to take a bite of the forbidden fruit: after all, we are people. The ancient legend of man driven from Paradise is put into a new light, for perhaps the very reason he took a bite of the forbidden fruit was because he wanted to be driven out, because he did not want to continue living in Paradise, where--according to Hegel--"only animals can survive, not people".

Only one method of defense remains: the suppression of sensuality, asceticism, fanaticism and rigorousness. The ethos of state-socialist culture is anti-sensual. Here we witness the return not only of religious taboos and morals taking on a new form (i.e. suppression of bodily pleasures, self-denial, sacrifice, ecstasy, zealotry), but also of the consciously self-humiliating--although, granted, not always actually experienced--ceremonies of self-punishment, confession and mortification (let us recall, for example, the so called "self-criticisms", the rites of ideological self-purification and exorcism, the dividing of the political world into "hell" and "heaven", the modernized and repoliticized forms of witch-hunting which were quite effective in manipulating mass-consciousness, the distortions of the party which were so reminiscent of a church hierarchy, the naturalization of the political morals of Jesuitism, etc.)

For a conceited "spirit", which has never geen confronted with its antithesis, and which portrays itself as a fully realized and eternal world order, there can be no more infuriating challenge than sensuality, regardless whether it is expressed in the form of "disorderliness", "rebellion", or a "departure" hidden in an anti-authoritarian gesture, a new artistic trend, or in a joke or remark. However,--by its very nature--it is precisely this spirit which brings to life, expands, unifies and gives a profanizing, critical and liberating meaning to the realm of sensuality by banning, persecuting and excluding more and more of the elements, interrelationships and properties which constitute the truth and the true consciousness from the domain of ideologically sanctioned experiences.

Bans demonize literature, by turning it into the literature of sensual temptation. Lists of "forbidden works" begins to circulate, and sometimes even the mere mentioning of "banned writers" is considered a taboo, works of the past and of the recent past branded as suspicious, heretic and subversive are pulled off the shelves of public libraries (during certain periods this not only keeps the paper-mills busy, but it also causes some anxious people to feverishly begin to decimate their library, burn their letters and manuscripts themselves, in the intimate privacy of their home, which, of course, also has long traditions in our region).

It is precisely as a result of the ban imposed on it, that the power of forbidden literature begins to multiply. The gaps in its moral, artistic and political argumentation become filled in. There is no longer any need to use rational arguments and standards to convince it that it is right. It is convincing and captivating even without that. The temptation of the "devil" is impossible to resist, for it promises not work but enjoyment, it offers not suffering but pleasure. The power of literature lies not in its content, but in its form. The ban gives it a new character in the form of sensual literature, and our relationship with the forbidden fruit, the mysterious object of our desire, is always mixed with a touch of fear and yearning.

Toward a Happy End

Let us sum up what we have said so far. With the rise of the bourgeois society, the monolithic ideology which had striven for absolute predominance, comes to an end. Yet, it is still not human needs, but the needs of the capitalist rule which determine the extent to which the limits of the "permissible" and the "tolerable" can be expanded. Everything, that permits and tolerates capital, and does not hamper its free movement is permissible and tolerable, especially if they themselves are generating capital. Everything that hampers the movement of capital is to be eliminated; undertakings which fail to produce capital or generate a profit are forbidden not for ideological reasons, but because they are considered financially irrational, impossible and absure. This is irrespective of how important they may really be from the point of view of the interests and needs of certain people and social groups, and perhaps even of society and humanity as a whole. The rationality of various activities--including spiritual activities--is no longer defined by ideologies, or even by people; it is determined solely by one thing: financial profit. And this is the kind of criticism which can fully assert itself even without, or despite ideologies. If it is able to successfully integrate the existing contradictions between capital and labor, then this external homogeneity is due not to a single, closed ideology, but precisely to the chaotic, coexisting and mutually cancelling or reinforcing voices of various ideologies, to diversity and competition, which constitute the ideological ideal itself in a society whose existence is determined not by ideological ideals, but by the material power of capital.

Theoretically, it is not hard to recognize: the only way material dependence can be overcome in this world of values and norms is by allowing human criteria to become predominant once again. The practical question, however, is this: who can represent this "human criterion", and how (in what manner, with what kind of guarantees, against what and whom); how can it be asserted (and what is it that makes this criterion "human"? in such a way, so that it does not turn into the ideology of anyone's special interests, or into an anachronistic, although perhaps --ideologically--forward looking form of spiritual and personal dependence? How can we ensure, that this anti-human criterion of financial profit which is so alien to man, becomes replaced by something other than the--undoubtedly human--criterion of "royal" prerogatives and privilages. Today, as we witness the crisis of statist, corporative-technology social organization, it is not hard to see that this new "human criterion", portrayed as a kind of final spiritual principle of eternal validity, cannot be "represented" by some privilaged group of society, be they the "elite of teachers", the "avant-garde of scientists" or the "caste of bureaucrats". The realization of the "human criterion" may only become the ideology and never the practice of a state which symbolizes the "true consciousness" the "universal interest" or the "future", which in practice also equates itself with the whole of society. No criterion, no goal, no standard or value can be considered human, if it appears outside of real life as a preconceived and predetermined spiritual principle, which after the autonomy of "individuals" (i.e. of living people, and social groups) has been destroyed, is asserted above them and used against them, and which they are forced to accept "in their own interest". Taking into consideration the manner and the consequences of its realization, even the most consistently "human" criterion may become anti-human. We know that the thesis, "nothing is of greater value to us than the human being" has gotten along beautifully with even the most anti-human practices. For in this abstract formula there are two unmentioned questions which must be answered: what do they mean by "to us" (well, what about "you", are you not human beings?), and what does the human being mean to you in terms of value, what is a human being when expressed in terms of value: autonomy, freedom, subject, a social concept, an individuum, or some sort of instrument, thing or object for something else, which only "you" know, and which is always transcendent in comparison?!

We have discussed how the despotic model of state socialism had evolved within the "second world" development model, inseparably from the forced and absurd jump it had to take to catch up (i.e. forced-paced industrialization, stockpiling based on central distribution), and how this model has had to lock every aspect of practical and spiritual life into a monolithic ideological universe, in order to eliminate capitalist rule. In other words, it was forced--at least to some extent --to return to the pre-capitalist societies' state of personal subordination, authority centered rule and "narrow-minded" ideological state (all of which have also had flourishing traditions in these countries).[37] But regardless whether we consider what happened a necessity or an avoidable (and above all: to-be-avoided) "evil", we must be aware of its anachronistic nature. We must recognize, that this kind of a return to the past will quickly lose its external and internal conditions, and will also fail as a "catch-up" strategy. It is becoming clear, that--perhaps from the very start--it is much more advantageous, productive and progressive to temporarily stay with a system of material dependence which, for the time being, differs from that of capitalism only in that it is not subjected exclusively to the logic of profit and to the interests of the capitalists, while also differing from the despotic version of state socialism in that it does not subject all material and personal factors to the state bureaucracy. The integration of external and internal, social and economic differences should continue simultaneously--and, of course, at opposite ends, complementing and correcting one another--through the institutions of marketing, planning and self-government, as well as through the various institutions set up for the safeguarding of interests. Undoubtedly, this leads to a certain kind of pluralism, the kind which during the period of transformation becomes a part of socialism's own history. The socially controlled autonomy of the market is complemented with the autonomy of those directly involved in production, thus making it possible from two sides to control and influence political power, which earlier had been virtually impossible. There is no longer a reason for controlling and curbing spiritual life from above or for depriving it of its autonomy. The greater the autonomy which direct producers have, and the more freedom of action, movement and expression the citizens, social groups and individuals can enjoy, the more is accomplished of the goals of socialism. From this point on, the stability of state rule is no longer the only criterion of socialist power; it is replaced by such factors as the performance, autonomy and democratic organization of the economy, the political institutions and the social public, without having to give its place to state autonomy and absolute rule.

Perhaps we need not dwell to much on the effects of state-directed, disciplined and top-controlled spiritual life, which--looking at its final consequences--have always been demoralizing, and have always spread feelings of apathy, lack of initiative, insincerity and servility. The well-known relationship continues to hold true: "if the people are forced to look upon free writings as illegitimate, they will eventually begin to view everything illegitimate as free, freedom as something illegitimate, and anything legitimats as non-free."[38] (Marx) The totalitarian spirit of an alienated and coercive state which transcends all individuals, social groups and classes, destroys the living spirit of the common person, and within the limits of a forced public life creates a "private-mob" psychology.

Human self-liberation does not go by the formula, "one step forward, two steps back". Only this kind of liberation can raise the literature of sensual temptation out of the sinful dimension of sensuality, to which it had been confined by the ban, without yielding ground to the apathy of matter. And once this happens, we too can look this literature into the eye without embarassment and without becoming excited--as one of the unpleasant peculiarities of prehistory.

LEADERS OF YOUTH ORGANIZATIONS INTERVIEWED

Interview With Sawic

Warsaw STUDENT in Polish 5-18 Nov 81 pp 1, 5

[Interview with Tadeusz Sawic, chairman of the Supreme Council of the Socialist Union of Polish Students [SZSP] by Waldemar Janda; date and place not given]

[Question] In the face of the experiences of the 1970's, does the student movement have a chance today to be a vital social force?

[Answer] In light of the 1970's, all that may be said is that there was a potential chance. A practical opportunity opened up for us, as it did for the student movement, only after the workers' protest, when we saw that it was possible to join together to create a force of protest. But at that time we did not make use of this opportunity, and I do not think that student organizations and the student community could have protested with success at that time. I think that this has been determined by history, because of the barrier which has been set up between workers and students. It was only the August protest which allowed us to believe that we, too, can be useful for something. What's more, it enabled us to become fully aware of the fact that our thinking is very similar.

[Question] What kinds of reactions did [the events of] August trigger in the organization?

[Answer] In our reactions, there was definitely something that was particularly catastrophic. This was not because we had to deny what we were doing at the time, but because did not have enough power to voice our anxiety and get results.

[Question] What forces served to weaken the organization? What was the basic reason that the SZSP was not the organization the students wanted it to be?

[Answer] The main reason was--and let us be honest about this--that the SZSP acted as a conveyor belt, a buffer between the authorities and the community. In trying to explain to students many phenomena from the sphere of political and social life, phenomena which, in fact, we ourselves did not understand, we lost any sort of opportunity for credibility within the academic community.

[Question] In other words, the SZSP was used to convincing the community that the authorities were infallible, that what they were doing was right...

[Answer] Yes, although there were also clashes with the representatives of authority. However, no practical conclusions were drawn from our criticism. Unfortunately, this information rarely became generally known.

[Question] The fact that the organization was used by the authorities to impose their will upon students discredited it. At the same time, however, another mechanism was in operation. The SZSP was a platform for reaching the authorities.

[Answer] This is an enormous exaggeration, a myth with which it is now worthwhile to take issue. The possibility did exist for individuals. But it should likewise be said that the authorities did not trust us. The SZSP was also--and this was, I believe, the organization's way of defending itself--a forum for the existence of controversial views. Perhaps these views did not become known on the outside. We were dealing with a phenomenon which characterized social and political life--a certain dualism. On the one hand, there was the official set of the "wise and healthy" SZSP which unequivocally supported the authorities, while on the other there was the set of the "doubting and uncertain." This is also why I think that to say today that the SZSP was a channel for reaching the authorities is an oversimplification. If we look today at all the social and political forces, we can find those which have clashed with the SZSP everywhere. Despite everything, authentic artistic and intellectual values have developed here in many autonomous clubs and branches. These values have preserved their specific character and have defended themselves against deviations.

[Question] Many of those who had doubts about unconventional views accidentally found their way into the organization, or entered in defiance of it.

[Answer] Too many people say this. The organization was aware of this differentiation of views from within.

[Question] Often this awareness was the cause of the fear of those who led the SZSP.

[Answer] Yes, often it was. But this fear took two directions. For some, it was the fear before one's decedents, while for others it was more and more the fear of what was setting in, the fear of the spectre of the nation's collapse.

[Question] The onset of the SZSP's regeneration occurred at a meeting of the aktiv in Uniejow in September 1980.

[Answer] Yes, for the SZSP Uniejow was a basic turning point in the organization's transformation and in the change in its aktiv. The program which we adopted at that time, a program of subjective participation in history, did not provide us, however, with the guarantee of success. There continued to exist within the community the belief that it was merely a temporary turn. Moreover, what is being said and who it is that is speaking was, and still is, important. It is a problem of SZSP credibility, which is a problem for every movement which has lived through [the events of] August and a problem which existed in the past under the old structures.

[Question] Of what did the changes in the SZSP consist?

[Answer] The organization decided to articulate in an independent manner the problems of that part of the community which it represented. Until this time it has been searching for its identity, its program. This program has been shaped by the rank-and-file movement which has arisen in the SZSP. The negative mechanism of the SZSP's being a conveyor belt between the authorities and the community has been cast off. Since August [1980], through the third congress and its current activity, we may speak of a liberated SZSP. We may speak of an organization which boldly determines and expresses all of the problems and views which prey upon its members.

[Question] In your opinion, how should the organization evolve, if it is agreed that it is to evolve?

[Answer] The discussion over the concept of the organization continues. We have adopted a broad formula for the independent political organization of the academic community, which we have put into statutory form, while preserving everything which is connected with the sphere of union activity.

[Question] The SZSP today appears to be a very diversified organization from the viewpoint of the views of its members. Some even charge it with vagueness and ideological muddiness. It is possible to state what view is held in common by the majority of SZSP members? Is there any ideological community?

[Answer] I would hesitate to speak unequivocally of an ideological community within the SZSP. I think that this common ground lies in seeking. We may rather speak of the existence of a political community.

[Question] Which means?

[Answer] Which means that the various groups within the SZSP take various positions with regard to reality. But the major trend, if you will excuse a hackneyed phrase, is the line of understanding and dialogue.

[Question] Of understanding and dialogue between whom?

[Answer] Among all prosocialist forces. The attempt to define an ideological canon within the SZSP itself is premature. It is a process; there is a need for understanding within the SZSP itself.

[Question] However, there are various groups in existence with a specific enough ideological program.

[Answer] Yes, on the one hand there is the group which aims to politicize the organization on the basis of the Marxist platform; on the other, there is the socializing group which wishes to combine the political formula of the organization with the union formula. The discussion between these views recurs again and again. It is difficult, however, to predict which current will prevail. Today they are clearly polarized.

[Question] Is the SZSP threatened with a split?

[Answer] I don't think so, since, as has been demonstrated during a great many critical moments, the SZSP has managed to come to an agreement from within. Those groups making up the organization have managed to limit themselves. I do not know whether, in perspective, it will be a process at the end of which a clash, a split will occur, however.

[Question] And how do you evaluate the effect of the SZSP on the community?

[Answer] If we are to propose such a basic criterion as the criterion of sympathy within and outside of the community, then in our case it is always too little. The SZSP must win people's sympathy. If, however, we are to speak of actual influence upon what is happening in the academic community, then what is needed to be able to evaluate this is another test after the test of the Lodz strikes. Of course, I am not inciting anything. But otherwise it is difficult to determine its importance. In my estimation, this influence is increasing. My optimism issues from the fact that for a long time the SZSP image was built by negotiation, in spite of efforts to seek a new image. Today, after all of those transformations--which were not always satisfactory--we are different. It is important that new people are creating this new quality. The paradoxical shift of the SZSP into the opposition camp in higher schools likewise changes our situation. Consequently, our influence is probably identified with the magnitude of the organization, with the number of its members.

[Question] The SZSP, however, has not abandoned its privileged position within the student community. It still controls a number of institutions (e.g., ALMATUR [Office of Travel and Tourism], clubs) which, although serving the entire student community, nonetheless lead to the suspicion of an organization with a monopoly on activity in the student community. This causes a lack of credibility in it.

[Answer] You say that the SZSP occupies a privileged position today. I think that this is not at all the case. We have various types of institutions, but I see no justification whatsoever for our losing them. In the first place, they serve the entire academic community without exception; secondly, we have a natural right to them, since we participated in their development and they are our property. Nor is this a privileged position, for in this way we have found ourselves likewise under the control of newly arisen organizations and under the pressure of the entire community as well.

[Question] Then is cooperation possible between organizations? For, although ideas of a self-governing body have been alive in schools for a long time, self-governing bodies arise first in factories, not in schools.

[Answer] The hopes which students have placed in the student movement renewal have not been fully realized. In its new organizational form, the community has felt better because it has had the chance to have its real divisions reflected. These have always existed and now they have been realized in organizatonal pluralism. At the same time, students have felt that they can do something, that they are more significant. And what happened? I do not wish to return to the thesis (one with which I disagree) that we are to present ourselves as a whole, and that this will give us greater power. The apparent unity of the student movement has been founded on this thesis. It is an illusion. Today we are faced with the dilemma of mutual understanding. Unfortunately, the inertia of the community is also a fact. A large part of it--this is merely an observation, not an accusation--stands on the sidelines. This does not mean that it is not involved. But this model, this proposal of a student organization does not suit everyone.

[Question] Does the creation of a self-governing body not lead to its assumption of the sphere of union activities which are now the domain of existing organizations?

[Answer] Perhaps the self-governing body will create a new image for the student movement. It will be the catalyst of transformations of all organizations. At the same time, a year of experience, unfortunately, has not indicated this. There is the danger that self-government will become a forum for the political battle between organizations, which is both a useless function and can in general frustrate the idea of the self-governing body.

[Question] And on what issues are mutual consultation in the forum of the self-governing body and joint action necessary today?

[Answer] Of greatest importance is the issue of the higher school system. We cannot waste the opportunity for the independence and democratization of the school. Today it is possible for us to implement our ideas about its form. The self-governing body is the place for disputing and polemicizing, but also for seeking out a community of ideas. Instead, the whole discussion has shifted into the political sphere, and while the school system is not independent of this sphere, the whole struggle is unprofitable both because it is a battle over the government of minds and because it is a struggle over trifles.

[Question] Nonetheless, the situation within the community is changing. There are more and more partners for consultation. ZSMP [Union of Socialist Polish Youth] circles are arising in the school...

[Answer] With what sort of ideology! With what!

[Question] Socialist, leftist.

[Answer] But this does not mean that the SZSP, in searching for a program, is distancing itself from leftist views. It is merely a question of the definition of the left.

[Question] Isn't it true that the SZSP is the only organization which wants to have people of various viewpoints within its ranks? The ZSMP is markedly specific, as are the KZMP [Communist Union of Polish Youth] and the ZMD [Union of Democratic Youth], the NZS [Independent Association of Students] is decidedly in favor of...

[Answer] Of what?

[Question] They are opposed to the method of exercising authority.

[Answer] But that is no program. It is a continual concept of negation. To return to the ZSMP, it enters the school without any sort of ideology. For isn't it true that it promises a job after studies are completed and patron housing. Its method is always the carrot-and-stick method. If only the ZSMP proposed the idea of joining the young intelligentsia with the working class...So I do not see any reason for the SZSP to have a complex for its lack of specificity.

[Question] But it is alleged that the SZSP's shallowness renders the setting up of powers within the student community impossible, because it wants to seize everything for itself, even though it is unable to come to terms with itself.

[Answer] Every new movement adopts the principle that it will climb up upon the mistakes and on the necks of those who are already embedded within the community. The SZSP has been so embedded. It is merely a clever trick today to suspect us of shallowness while not perceiving one's own shallowness. For me, only the KZMP is specific enough. But on the other hand, is the KZMP in a position to serve the broader aspirations of the community, or only the needs of those who have taken an unequivocal stand in their favor? I do not know whether the SZSP is in this position, but we are openly searching and we are not ashamed to admit our shortcomings. The NZS, in my opinion, is likewise an eclectic organization.

[Question] The NZS brings together people of very varied ideological orientations, but its political orientation is clearly defined: it is the ally of [NSZZ] Solidarity, "the opponent of whatever is old," which includes the SZSP. NZS operatives say that on one side of the barricade is the association representing the general student population, and on the other side, the government and the SZSP.

[Answer] That is an oversimplification! I am not jealous of the illustrious position of our NZS colleagues, who define themselves as opposed to everything that should be destroyed. It is a very attractive position, which can unite many people. But what sort of permanence can such a basis for unity have? The SZSP is not in principle a progovernment organization, unperceiving of the mistakes of the authorities. It is continually defined in this way because it is convenient to say that the government and the SZSP stand in one house. With the broadening of the government platform, it will be more difficult to determine whether someone is progovernment or antigovernment, because the criteria for setting up the division will have to break down. This will come about when the government begins to represent the majority of the Polish people.

[Question] You spoke of a test which would be necessary to evaluate the organization's popularity. In an earlier such test, during the Lodz strikes, the SZSP was blamed for hampering the strikes, for countering them. This did not add to the SZSP's popularity.

[Answer] Nonsense. To say that would be like saying today that the NZS called those strikes. The SZSP neither hampered them, nor did the NZS call them. The strikes were the result of the objective development of the situation in the student community. They were a reply to the resounding problems of higher education which had not been resolved by the government, and in particular by the Ministry of Higher Education. In spite of our protests. Of course, the NZS had the advantage of being a new force. It was a new thing in the company of other new things. Thus the association: the SZSP as a conservative, oppositional force and the NZS as a progressive, restitutive force. That was too simple.

[Question] But the SZSP's approach to the strikes was considerably more severe; it counted on the success of negotiations.

[Answer] We wished to avoid confrontation with other social groups at any price. The fact that this was not a mistake has now been confirmed. The danger of confrontation was there, we should not forget this. We were opposed to drastic measures, although we accepted the strike as the ultimate form of struggle. At the time, the strikes were, in fact, an indispensable form of action. This was the fault of the authorities. To return to the division into progressive and conservatives--I think that the dividing line is not between the NZS and the SZSP, but primarily between NSZZ Solidarity and the party. This line is found within each of these organizations.

[Question] If this is so, then why is there not the transformation of these organizations into new organizations reflecting these divisions?

[Answer] And who would want to unite under a banner of conservatism?

[Question] In its program documents, the PZPR refers exclusively to socialist unions of youth. In this way it passes over the existence of other organizations. But the members of these organizations represent a large part of the community. What is your position on this question?

[Answer] That is something for the party itself to decide.

[Question] In other words, you believe that the policy of the party with regard to the student movement is its affair and that the SZSP will not present its position?

[Answer] The SZSP has declared many times that it is for a very broad platform of cooperation. We bear out this statement. The party commits itself to cooperation with all those who are not opposed to it. If I were to speak my mind to the PZPR and to suggest something to them, I think that the platform of cooperation with the youth movement shoud be broader. It is not feasible today to limit the youth movement to four loyal organizations. The youth movement's view of the problems of young people is already in a state of misunderstanding, to say nothing of their problems viewed solely and exclusively by several of many existing organizations. The party should decide in favor of broader dialogue with the youth. I believe that the current PZPR position issues from the fact that unions cooperating with the party are attacked by other organizations. Hence the party's dilemma--will its opening itself up to others be treated as a vote of no confidence in its current partners? This is likewise a problem for the new trade union movement. To whom should it open itself up among the youth, should it be open solely and exclusively to those who unequivocally declare their full support or should it also decide to cooperate with those who think somewhat differently, which does not mean that they are opponents?

[Question] Does the SZSP have official contacts with the [NSZZ] Independent Self-governing Trade Union Solidarity?

[Answer] We have contact with them in the schools, but not on a central scale. This does not mean that we are opposed to such contact. On the contrary--we are in favor of such cooperation. We do not intend to forego it. We have natural possibilities for cooperation with NSZZ Solidarity and the ZNP [Polish Teachers Union], since with reference to schools there is, perhaps, a community of interests and methods in the approach to the self-governing higher school. We also have working students within our ranks, and contact through them with unions is a very natural thing. This also makes possible our reaching out beyond the student ghetto, the mechanisms of which are always very destructive to the community and its organizations. Contacts with NSZZ Solidarity are complicated by the tendency to compartmentalize--these are good, those are bad. Such is the manner of association. This is a tremendous oversimplification. Many of us would like to avail ourselves of the possibility of evaluating reality in exclusive black and white terms. But our vision must be more complex than that, based on a penetrating view, moderately objective, of what surrounds us. This takes time.

[Question] But that is just a step away from saying that time will resolve everything, and our activities and activism will rise to another plane.

[Answer] No, I do not wish to be understood to say that history rushes me along, although I often feel that way. I would rather that it be we--and this may likewise refer to the SZSP--who moved history. I am a firm believer in Norwid's wise saying that "It is not God who sets up a threshhold for people, but people who set it up for themselves."

Interview with Guzy

Warsaw STUDENT in Polish 5-18 Nov 81 pp 1, 4

[Interview with Jaroslaw Guzy, chairman of the National Coordination Commission [KKK] of the Independent Association of Students [NZS] by Wojciech Borek; date and place not given]

[Question] Let us begin with the basics, i.e., with a characterization of the NZS. I would like you to start by trying to define the ideological place of the community of association members.

[Answer] It is an organization which arose under special conditions and its ideology has not been defined precisely and put into writing. What is the reason for this? The NZS came into existence after August [1980] based on principles similar to those that served as the basis for [NSZZ] Solidarity, only within the student movement. Of course, it does not have the character of a trade union, because there is a completely different system of community needs. The NZS is trying to construct an operational model in which the union portion does not enter the foreground to the detriment of that activity which issues from motives such as those which guided the founders of the organization. Hence an ideology which has issued from the need for restitution, in the name of society, of those rights which have been taken away from it by the authorities during the entire 35-year period. This is our basic ideology, evident in our every move. It is that which binds us: the restriction of the rights of the academic community, of civil rights is always extolled in our program.

[Question] We are entering a sphere which invites controversy. The NZS defines itself as an apolitical organization. On the other hand, if you say that the sphere of union activities is secondary then what, if not politics, is primary?

[Answer] No. I do not remember any political NZS actions. It is a question of the definition of "apoliticism" and a definition of politics in general. We do not concur with that definition of politics which is advanced, for example, by the journalists of TRYBUNA LUDU or ZOLNIERZ WOLNOSCI, or the theoreticians of the WSNS [Higher School of Social Sciences] (not all!). Hence the controversy. In my opinion, there should be no such controversies. We are not conducting political activity. We are conducting an activity which is viewed as political by the authorities. But the authorities would like to see everything as political, and, consequently, reserved for their own jurisdiction. We cannot agree with this; hence the constant conflicts. I don't know whether you agree with the concept of politics as expounded by the authorities, but I do not agree with that concept.

[Question] For me, the definition of something as political or apolitical is of less significance than content. A defensive attitude underlies both politicism as you have described it and apoliticism. Just as someone may be attacked for their "politicism," they may also be attacked for their "apoliticism."

[Answer] Yes, of course. In other words, to state it clearly: The NZS is not evading all issues which are of interest to students. On the other hand, the organization has clearly offered proof of the fact that it is not entering directly into the sphere of politics (in this case the sphere of politics is activity leading to the acquisition of authority). The NZS will not submit a register of voters in the coming elections to the people's councils. This does not mean that it will not act in the name of reforming electoral law. But such action is not political activity; it is normal social activism in the name of restoring political rights to society. And here accusations of politicism may occur.

[Question] The question of the pluralism of attitudes within organizations is closely linked with politicism. Within the NZS, a whole spectrum of views and world views exists. In this context, I would like to ask about the origins of the association. What is the tradition closest to yours, and in what direction do you intend to continue it?

[Answer] Our tradition is quite clearcut and concrete. The KZS Congress referred back to the traditions of the SKS [Student Solidarity Committee]. Hence the pluralistic formula of the independent student organization. We do not aim to transform ourselves into an organization which would not permit a student with definite political views to become a member. There is no formal reason for a PZPR student member not to sign up in our organization. We do not wish to be exclusive within the community. In conjunction with this, there were discussions concerning an ideological declaration at the congress, i.e., whether to adopt one in general. The possibility of limiting the open formula of our organization was feared. Of course, certain statutory formulations already impose an ideology, but it is an ideology which is so open and universal that, in fact, it closes the door to no one.

[Question] Does not the openness of your ideology mean a lack of ideology? Was the fact that you did not adopt an ideological declaration not something of a retreat from obstacles?

[Answer] No. We ascertained that the community was not yet mature due to a lack of more serious discussion of the subject. This does not mean that at the next congress, which is to be held in Wroclaw in December, we will not adopt such a declaration. In any event, among those who are discussing such an eventual declaration, there are no adherents of the idea to diminish the pluralism declared by the NZS. Thus, even if we do adopt some sort of ideological declaration, it will likewise be very universal.

[Question] If I remember correctly, two concepts collided at the congress, conventionally known as "Warsaw socialism" and the "Christian Democratic" concept.

[Answer] There were many blunders in that discussion. These two declarations functioned on various planes, complementing one another. One, the Warsaw declaration, referred back to the democratic opposition and independent student movements from the 1970's, while the second referred to much more deeply rooted traditions. But to define the latter as Christian Democratic or National Democratic is unwarranted. We may, perhaps, quarrel with certain elements of phraseology, but it is not an unequivocal issue even for experts on the subject. With regard to the contents therein, in my opinion they have not violated the pluralism which we have declared.

[Question] Is the association not threatened with a split because of its announced pluralism and strong decentralization?

[Answer] I do not think so, for one reason. In such a political system as we function, under this system of authority, it is an obvious fact that all independent activities should be activities of solidarity. It is no accident that the independent trade union is called Solidarity. We must be close-knit. I do not perceive decentralizing tendencies. Even if they do appear--and that is normal, because there are always differences within a pluralistic model--the external system reminds us that we must act jointly.

[Question] Let us continue for a moment on the subject of pluralism. How does one reconcile the close ties with the church with pluralism?

[Answer] Like the whole of our society, we are rooted in a certain tradition, in which the church is the unchallenged moral authority. Hence, as an institution which has never lost its independence, which has helped foster the preservation of an enclave of life not under the dominion of the authorities, it is close to us. Our visit to the primate had the characteristics of a symbol. It was not a visit of the faithful to the head of the church...

[Question] A propos, are you a Catholic?

[Answer] I am, but not the kind that would please every pastor. What is important in the church for us is the universal qualities to which the church appeals more and more in contemporary society. I have not observed any conflict in the direct activity of the believers and the nonbelievers among us.

[Question] And what is the nature of the association's ties with [NSZZ] Solidarity?

[Answer] There are no formal ties. We are really an independent organization, and our contacts with Solidarity issue merely from our and their goodwill. It is a dual sort of contact with the entire union and with the elements in the academic community. These contacts, which had been more or less sporadic, now augur of greater steadfastness. By virtue of a resolution adopted at the congress, the newly elected union authorities are obliged to conclude an agreement on cooperation with us. This agreement will guarantee such things as the settlement of the problem of graduates, who will thus be protected by the union.

[Question] Let us devote a few words to independence. At the First NRZ Congress, the dominant trend was one which led to being shut off and to the psychosis of the beleaguered fortress. It was said: independence above all. But this cuts off the possibility of constructive action.

[Answer] I did not notice that we had concentrated our attention on our independence. Rather, if we are to speak of the hermeticism of our community, it is hermetic in the face of the moves of the authorities, who would like to subject the community in some way to themselves. And here, of course, the term "beleaguered fortress" is justified. In what way were we shut off--to ideas, to people? I think that this was your subjective feeling.

[Question] Yes, but it was this very atmosphere which led to soft-pedaling the issue of student self-government. Centers where the NZS felt itself threatened feared the self-governments.

[Answer] I would interpret this situation differently. Gdansk and Wroclaw quarreled over the subject of the self-governing body. Local experiences in these centers were diametrically opposed. It was not without reason that Wroclaw was afraid that a self-governing body appointed from above as the "only representative" of the community would menace NZS interests. In a passive community, the self-government is a body which is easy to suppress. School authorities, ill-disposed to the NZS, at Lodz University, for example, aim at appointing a self-governing body to make life easy for themselves.

[Question] But similar fears undercut the idea of the self-governing body per se.

[Answer] No, they do not. We discussed the idea of the self-governing body with our Wroclaw colleagues and we were in agreement on many fundamental questions. Later, at the congress, more thorough discussion was lacking. The discussion was fairly one-sided, without rejoinder. Hence, to an outside observer, the self-governing body might have appeared to be an enemy of the NZS or an unwillingly accepted alternative. For the interim, people wish to determine the form of the self-governing body when they feel it is needed.

[Question] Program discussion was also lacking at the congress. The only association program for the present is, to the observer's eyes, a program of immediate opposition and demand. You are joined together, for example, by the issue of political prisoners. This seems to be too little. An association should work out a constructive program.

[Answer] This is a reproach with reference to the congress. But the congress consisted of 3 days filled to the brim and not preceded by discussion. The NZS came into being independent of itself at many academic institutions, and its first actions, as well as its initial program declarations were extremely convergent.

[Question] Yes, it was easy in the various centers to become integrated with regard to what was unsatisfactory, to what was obviously to be questioned. I am concerned about the manner of entering the second phase, when it comes.

[Answer] We do anticipate entering the second phase. Hence the call for a second congress to be held as soon as possible, in order to work out a program of action. In advance, we envisage that it will be a program congress. We want to be well prepared in order to guard against running amok procedurally, which would bungle any attempts at merritorious discussion.

[Question] What, in your opinion, will be the makeup of the program to be worked out there?

[Answer] I see it to be on two planes. The first plane is composed of academic matters, the second, general social matters. Here we go beyond certain models adopted for a student organization, because we try to have an effect on everything that is happening in the country, in accordance with the will of our members. To move to concrete issues: there are the matters of the progressive reform of the higher school system, recruitment for studies and teaching programs. At the same time let us remember that in our decentralized structure most issues are left up to the schools, and if possible they are left up to faculties. The reason for that is so that certain things would be done by the people who are directly interested in them. Next, the issue of unemployed graduates and many others. Beyond this, the NZS aspires to continue to be an organization which acts in the name of democratic changes in the country. Here the program is intuitively perceptible. Our demands do not boil down to obtaining the release of those several persons from the leadership of the KPN [Confederation for Independent Poland] who are still under arrest, but amount to ensuring that the system of abiding by law and order does not permit the imprisonment of people for their convictions.

[Question] I understand that this intuitive program of the NZS was implemented during the course of the year of the association's existence. What is the balance sheet for these activities? What have you done for the community, what can you be proud of?

[Answer] Our accomplishments have been many, although they are not enough, and they have certainly not been summed up. I will speak of the examples I know best, i.e., from the bailiwick of the Jagellonian University [UJ]. Initially, the NZS completely took the initiative in such matters as programs of study. The opposition to the forms of teaching ideological subjects and to the Russian-language course was most spectacular. The NZS began to be concerned over the quality and the level of studies. At the UJ all of this was conducted more or less without conflict because the school authorities were well disposed. In Lodz, however, the problems began at the level of the academic institution, since the demands which the school authorities were in a position to fulfill were not implemented.

[Question] This was the reason for the student strike, which led to later understandings.

[Answer] Yes. A paradoxical situation ensued in which there were some Lodz demands which had already been resolved in Krakow in the fall of the preceding year. In Lodz, the NZS was not as strong as it was in other centers, but it was immediately evident who had written the demands and who took the initiative in supporting these demands and in discussion. In view of the SZSP [Socialist Union of Polish Students] position during the strike, the idea of the Student Unity Committee [SKJ] collapsed. The SKJ turned out to be a sham union of the student community, which is not uniform where organizations are concerned. The SZSP is not our partner and because of this we cannot work in cooperation with it. It is an organization which has not changed in practice since the time that SZSP operatives were ceremonially awarded party membership cards--an organization compromised in the past.

[Question] You express your resentment of the SZSP, resentment which was vehemently stressed at the NZS congress. The tone of the third SZSP Congress was similar. Emotions ruled the day in both cases. For the present, the academic community is socially unified, the interests of all students are held in common. Despite this, differences in the plan of organization take on a radical character.

[Answer] You speak of the common interests of students which both organizations should implement. But the SZSP did not implement the interests of students! Let's not kid ourselves. And if they did implement them, then they did so to the extent that decisionmaking factors made this possible, not forgetting their own privileges. It is not so that the government is on one side and that we and the SZSP are on the other. No, we are on one side together with the students, for there is no other organization which attempts to represent student interests before the authorities, and the government and the SZSP are on the other side. During the strikes the SZSP was used, in fact, to liquidate them.

[Question] But there are such matters as the recent changes in the draft law on higher schools, on which both organizations take a similar position.

[Answer] Verbal protests mean little. The storm has quieted, but certain subtle changes have been wrought and it will be interesting to note the SZSP's position when the law is passed. I suspect it will be more or less in line with the official view. A situation may occur, however, which will surprise me, although it is the desirable one, i.e., that our views will be united.

[Question] Are you aware that you represent the better students?

[Answer] No, we represent all students. Our members are not better, they are more active. We commit ourselves to act in the name of the entire community, and when that community holds us in poor esteem, we will not have the effect we now have.

[Question] In your estimation, is the influence of the NZS in the community greater than the influence of the SZSP?

[Answer] In my estimation, yes. It depends what we mean by influence. You may say: you do not organize tourist excursions abroad and the percentages are unmistakably clear. But is everyone who tours with ALMATUR [Office of Travel and Tourism] an SZSP devotee? Let's not pretend that this is so.

[Question] And what do you propose in the place of tourist attractions to people who wish to enter the association?

[Answer] If someone becomes a member of the NZS, he has the right to advance his own ideas and no one will impose anything on him. He himself may conceive those projects which he wishes to see implemented by the NZS. This is a basic matter. The organization is whatever the members make of it, and if a given person enters the NZS then he, too, will leave his mark upon our joint action.

CREATION OF NEW YOUTH FEDERATION REPORTED

Warsaw SZTANDAR MLODYCH in Polish 28 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Katarzyna Zaczkiewicz]

> [Text] The Independent Youth Front, the Committee of the Polish Youth Union (ZMP), the Council of Self-Governing Body Cooperation, the School Youth Movement, the Communist Union of Polish Youth, the Student Renewal Movement, the Independent Student Union. After August school centers teemed with those fervently desiring to support organizational renovation. This in spite of widespread conviction about the passivity, lack of ideals and consumer attitude of the young toward life.

Teachers, school directors marvelled; in school superintendent's offices--consternation. Educators had no idea how to react to such unprecedented activity. However, in the majority of cases they looked at it with suspicion, because slogans proposed by students, particularly the most general ones, free expression of political opinions of striving for truth, seemed to have been realized long ago, so the educators were surprised by their revindication. Well, what was talked about at school heretofore?

Dynamite Without Label

Here and there, a sloppily printed paper, barely holding together with one staple or a clip, could be found under the bench. Such papers have been disturbing for quite a time--however, one has got used to them. Now, 1 year after the beginning of the renewal in the country, exactly on 12 and 13 September, small students' organizations, not linked with each other, assumed an institutionalized form and created in Gdansk a National Founding Committee (OKZ) of the Independent Federation of School Youth (NFMS). Some 150 students from high schools (mostly general high school students) agreed on a small-size program comprising 16 items.

Program presidium has been elected and its task established as of an executive organ. The federation set for itself very general objectives, which one could call as vague, and large, like fundamental law records (for example establishing communal education). Only half of the program's items concerned directly the school and the organization of the educational program, which was intentional. "We refuse to have our eyes and ears closed, and not only at school"--said the deputy chairman Tomasz Sokolewicz from the J. Rej High School in Warsaw. "The question is to have an efficient flow of information, of objective learning, in other words--a restructuring of the school system."

Point 1 of the program advocates values which are indisputable and not contrary to the socially accepted system--patriotism, tolerance, personal freedom, truth, while the already existing social and political organizations add such values as peace and justice to the list. Sixteen and 17 year-olds fortunately do not know anything about war from their personal experience, nor can their imagination reach that far. And as concerns justice or social equality which the members of the NFMS mentioned--they are to be covered by the word freedom. A free and tolerant person--as they see--will undoubtedly strive for justice.

Education and individuality--self-education, control of the program of instruction and an active role in the school life--occupy a leading place in the program. The federation does not define itself politically, which does not mean that its members are neglecting to raise their political awareness (point 4), by organizing circles of self-education, forming "networks of independent periodicals" and "independent student libraries." They aim at "objectivization of humanities in teaching programs," "making possible the observance of certain anniversaries, which would be acknowledged by the federation as worthy."

They are aware of their influence on what occurs or what will take place at the school, and I suspect that after reading the program goals of the federation, a number of teachers will have doubts whether these young people are not planning to replace us in the process of education and management of educational institutions?

And so, the members of the federation aim to "achieve student's participation in pedagogical councils" and not only with the right to express their opinion on excursions, contributions and fees, amusements, but also with the right to vote on the subject of students' qualifications! But what is more, they demand student representation during the admission examinations to high schools.

The way of admitting additional places and preferences are, so far, an impenetrable charade shrouded in strictest secrecy. It may be worthwhile to attempt to dissipate charges of the arbitrariness in grading and favoritism. But what will happen with the authority of educators, the secrecy of deliberations of the pedagogical council, ensured by the school statute and school discipline? Which school superintendent's office will agree to the anarchism of education? It looks as if the defendants intend to occupy the places of jurors.

"We don't want to take over the role of the ZNP members"--they say--"we wish to become joint managers" and not school managers with full rights. However, with such a bold program this word "joint" does not surface, it vanishes in the abysmal depth of the sea of competence, which those federalists are demanding.

A question also arises, how can these ambitions be realized, what is and what will the reactions be?

The Reaction of the Environment

"What is a teacher's opinion--such is his reaction." Members of the Polish Teachers Union (ZNP) treat with hostility any type of organization with the adjective "independent." As Marzena Duszynska, a member of the federation, comments, school superintendents try to "ditch" the activity of the organization and to explain that they understand the nature of the school differently. The important problem is that the student will study, change his clogs and look neatly and decently.

School directors do not declare themselves openly against students' organizations, but consider that "something like that" does not fit in the school. This "something" (the word "organization" is carefully avoided), the so-called school periodical, for example WOLNA TRYBUNA. At the Batory General High School in Warsaw this periodical had to be submitted to the school director's censorship prior to distribution to students. WOLNA TRYBUNA does not exist anymore, but at a place where it is difficult to take it down, an indecent paper hangs. Sometimes the school director calls an "activist" in for a talk and asks in a friendly way: "What is going on in your head, would it not be better to join in a circle of true interest?" The deputy chairman of the federation, Tomek, had to change schools because he was accused of belonging to the Confederation for Independent Poland (KPN). At the PAX High School in Warsaw the spokesman of OKZ was advised by a lady professor that he better not try to join the school self-governing body.

But the movement has not been "ditched" everywhere. Certain teachers are simply delighted that, at last, young people want to do something and take active part in lessons of civic upbringing which, until now, were boring and colorless and to give reports on interesting historical subjects, research source materials and search for the truth. In 46 general high schools in Warsaw, history textbooks for the fourth grade were put aside and the students turned to publications of the independent union "Solidarity" and set up school libraries as well.

Plans for the Future

The federation has spokesmen in 18 Polish towns starting with Male Gluszyce, to Lignica, Inowroclaw, Jastrzebie to Gdansk and in the capital. These spokesmen serve as contacts between the regions. They supply information to anybody who is interested, transmit to their members federation resolutions and programs. Similarly to "adult" organizations, they use the help of experts--most often university professors, particularly during the organization of "self-educational lectures."

Founding committees are soon to be merged in a general regional meeting of the region, by 14 November democratic elections for the National Congress are planned, which will work out a program and tasks for the federation. An extended and detailed program will result from an analysis of requirements supplied by separate regions.

The basic aim of the Founding Committee is to attain as soon as possible licensing of the federation. However, if the licensing should meet with serious difficulties from the authorities--the members of the union would not hesitate to stage protests, the form and place of which have not as yet been defined by OKZ.

In general, the Federation of School Youth has not explained many of its plans. However, the unprecedented dynamism of the programs and the fight to obtain or to gain individual recognition for the school at this time creates embarrassment to educational authorities, and yet it should lead to the formulation of a clear position. The rise of an independent school organization may be treated as a childish tomfoolery, passed over in silence, not noticed. However, it is known from experience, that practice of seeming or factual nonengagement, based on the principle "let's wait, somebody will get bored with it"--under today's realities, will be undermined by tension and prove incorrect.

For several months youth weeklies have been described as activities of independent organizations. However, no official response has been heard. And teachers are waiting, because--so-far--they don't know how to react. Who does or doesn't play his game at the expense of, or with the help of young people? As a matter of fact, what is it all about? Demands of self-government seem to be valid, this is the aim of the social renewal, but political problems are provoking and they are unclear. There has never been anything like this in the school history. It may be proper, as long as it is not too late to undertake an essential discussion with the young people who after all, sometimes think, evaluate, criticize independently, and consistently demand changes.

PRISTINA TELECAST ON TEXTBOOKS CRITICIZED

Belgrade POLITIKA EKSPRES in Serbo-Croatian 6 Nov 81 p 12

[Article by Ljiljana Bulatovic, reporter for TV Belgrade: "As if Nothing Had Happened!"]

[Text] Why was there hardly one remark of any seriousness made on the content of the textbooks which have been used to teach youngsters in Kosovo?

Periodically, a program in the series "Do We Really Know One Another?" appears on television. The program involves the efforts of all TV centers. This time, 28 October of this year, the host was TV Pristina.

With good reason, the hosts chose the theme of the role of textbooks in familiarizing students with other republics and nationalities in our country. Keeping in mind the extent to which they were mentioned in analyses of the conditions for counterrevolution in Kosovo, it was natural to expect that this show would put an end to the critical analysis of textbooks in Kosovo.

However, by the content and the manner of dialogue of the hosts one was not really able to tell whether the program was recorded before the so-called "disagreeable events" in Kosovo or quite recently. The guests on the program were, for the most part, cast in the role of the audience in spite of their effort to talk truthfully about the general and particular problems of political textbooks published in our country.

The program cannot be quoted, but an unpleasant impression of it remains: people responsible for this problem in Kosovo and those who have been newly appointed did not find a single serious comment to make on the content of textbooks which have been used to teach and to educate dozens of generations of youngsters from Kosovo. Even the executive secretary of the Political Committee of the Central Committee of Kosovo, Rahman Dedaj, only posed a few questions which would generally be worth talking about, whether a little more attention should be given to Albanian writers and history in other republics and provinces, etc. He considered the most important problem in the publishing of textbooks to be "structural and conceptual," and he remarked that textbooks are still burdened with traditionalism, too much emphasis on history, and "sometimes nationalism."

Listening to him, it was hard to believe that an executive secretary of the League of Communists of the Socialist Autonomous Province of Kosovo feels the need to speak in this way about the role of textbooks in the mutual familiarization of Yugoslav children! And this after everything that the Yugoslav public has learned anyway about the content of textbooks which have been used to teach those thousands of youngsters who have loudly expressed such an anti-Yugoslav disposition!

To a remark by Comrade Midorag Bogicevic from Sarajevo that 80 percent of the writers in readers for elementary school in Kosovo are Albanian, the newly appointed director of the provincial enterprise for the publishing of textbooks began to count the names of Yugoslav writers in the readers just mentioned. The percentages he arrived at are not important. However, this was not the only tacit negative truth. To the questioning assertion of Comrade Bogicevic that surely Comrade Tito is represented in the proper manner in the histories and readers in the province as well as in all textbooks, the hosts tacitly agreed. It is even more difficult to forgive them for this. Either they are not acquainted with the facts or they do not wish to speak the truth.

Although the program was recorded in the month of July in Kosovo during conditions in which such large numbers of youngsters were placed under an irredentist banner, our TV crew was not able to come to a more complete understanding of the truth concerning the textbooks. Even when we were assured, for example, that there were no reprinted textbooks from Tirana, several days later some were seized in stores in Podujev.

It is not our intention to rub salt in the wounds of the Kosovo counterrevolution, but this article is a protest against the forgetfulness and the suppression which is again beginning to overcome us. For this reason we recall the speech of Tihomir Vlaskalic at a meeting of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Serbia on 6 May of this year: ..."It is not only a matter of textbooks which in an incomprehensible manner have a broad potential for the indoctrination of young people.

We must also purge and make difficult everything which produces a reactionary consciousness of dogmatic etatism and Albanian nationalism. We must free the young generation from the pressure of indoctrination and educate them in the spirit of equality and brotherhood and unity, in the spirit of Yugoslav socialistic patriotism."

Finally, in the Conclusions of the Central Committee of the LCY from a meeting on 7 May is this statement as it appears: "Considering the gravity of the situation in the university and in the secondary schools in Kosovo, it is necessary to carry out a critical analysis of the system of education, cadre policy, as well as of textbooks, above all from the ideological, political and pedagogic point of view."

The TV program lasted 45 minutes. This does not mean that any of these conclusions were touched upon. This is in keeping with the spirit of things when textbooks in Kosovo are in question--nothing was accomplished. The well-intentioned viewers were irritated to find out the truth about these textbooks and the measures taken to replace and change them. Periodically there has been a speech on this theme in different forums in Kosovo, but it does not have any connection with what happened that afternoon on the screen.

Finally, a couple of explanations: first of all, it is not customary for television reporters to criticize television programs in the newspaper. This is not the case here. This is a protest against the suppression of those little stumbling blocks which get in the way of realizing self-management socialistic relations in our country, especially those involved in the education of young people. At the same time, this is also the continuance of an intention to speak about things as they are, an intention which we expressed aloud after the counterrevolution in Kosovo, which in some forms continues there even today. This is also a protest against the news that Saban Hiseni, the replaced director of Radio Pristina, has become an advisor in the main office of Radio-Television Pristina.

The second explanation is for the question, why in the EKSPRES? Because I value highly the view this paper took toward the events in Kosovo and because I believe in the consistency of its editorial policy.

QUESTION OF ONE VERSUS SEVERAL LC CANDIDATES DISCUSSED

Belgrade KOMUNIST in Serbo-Croatian 13 Nov 81 p 11

[Article by Milivoje Tomasevic: "Elections and Cadre Policy"]

[Text] It should not be the case that elections are the end of cadre policy in this period of the selection dilemna (one or more candidates). Many think that the harmony between the basic determinations of cadre policy and the practice of elections is seriously disturbed, that elections and cadre policy are even in irreconcilable conflict.

All agree on the main points, that no one dares to achieve a monopoly in cadre policy, and that this position in our society must be made more democratic. Nor is there any argument over the sovereign right of the citizen to have a say about those who influence his life, and therefore, he himself should choose the people in whom he will place his trust.

More Candidates for Every Position

The dilemna originates in the realization of cadre policy. Some people think that there should be more candidates on every list for every position. In favor of this opinion, one can cite Tito's words from a report at the 11th LCY Congress: "In the process of nomination and selection, for every position, even the most responsible, a greater number of candidates should compete; it is understood that they meet the established criteria. Then people will really be able to choose, according to their own judgment and decision, the best candidates, for whom they will extend genuine support...Attempts of individuals and groups to choose, concerning cadre policy and selection, people outside the election organs and bodies, or allegedly in their name, but in fact opposed to the principles and criteria of our cadre policy, must be prevented."

In spite of such a "platform" which is built into our basic documents in favor of the thesis concerning more candidates, examples can also be cited of inferior work of individual cadre coordinating bodies. These bodies, as was recently reported in the press, instead of directing cadre policy and worrying about respecting social criteria, sometimes directed their work at administrative appointment, and in this way practically held a monopoly in cadre policy.

Essence and Form

In practice, when only one candidate exists for each position, elections resemble voting to a greater extent than they do determination. When the voter votes only "for" or "against," then it is difficult really to regard this as being the same thing as the sovereign right of the citizen to choose for himself the one in whom he will put his trust.

The defenders of the thesis that more candidates than the number being chosen should not be placed on the cadre lists say that the essence (to choose the best) is more important than the form (the methods of the elections). They say that an emphasis on more candidates might cause more harm than good, might lead to factional and cliquish competition or even to the political division of citizens on demagogic and unprincipled bases. They recall that the emphasis on more candidates on the whole has led to sharp conflicts, factionalism along with the use of prohibited methods and dramatic outcomes.

It is useful, indeed, to remember, even in the extreme, how elections have been carried out until now. In the first postwar elections, there existed a unique alternative to the "blind ballot box." Anyone who was not "for" someone was given the opportunity (secretly) to drop their marker into the "opposition box." The Election Law of 1953 provided the opportunity to nominate more people than the number of positions for representatives of the federal and republic parliaments.

This was, however, too much of a temptation for people who did not have sufficient political experience and so many candidates were put into severe political struggles which for some groups and individuals brought more harm than good. Then began the search for an election process which would guarantee democracy and which would prevent undesirable conflicts.

The "Fatique" of the Selection System

That this is no simple matter is demonstrated by the fact that the two extreme positions are defended with equal zeal and almost the same quality of argument. Indeed, there is no doubt that emphasizing only one candidate must not automatically mean that the proceedings are not democratic. In the same way, a formal selection procedure with more candidates on the list does not guarantee democracy.

Fortunately, one essential point cannot be disputed. It is the complex "fatique" which is evident in the present selection system. That the selection proceedings are ripe for a change can be illustrated, on one hand, by the well-known lack of interest of the "base" (in the last delegate elections those people whose names were near the end of the list according to alphabetical order lost fairly regularly, regardless of their proven personal qualities) which can be interpreted as a form of protest. On the other hand, individuals in whose selection the "base" did not have a critical influence would have to feel a greater responsibility toward those who "pushed them through," like it or not, than toward those people who only voted for them officially and whose (official) representatives they are.

Therefore, there is no argument concerning the main problem--making cadre policy more democratic. The argument, however, lies in how this should be done. It is obvious that something in the lists and in the manner of selection must be changed. There are two reasons for this: everyone who is chosen (directors, delegates, officials) must be put into the position of being even more dependent on the electoral base, of being accountable to it, and on the basis of this accountability people can choose those they trust. At the same time, this is an altogether reliable way to force people who are elected to consider less their advancement and to struggle more for the policies and programs of the LCY. Only then will those who are chosen have the full support of the base. It remains, therefore, that in the preparations for the elections a way be found which would also provide for the corresponding national and class structure.

Finally, it should be said what is being particularly emphasized in meetings of the Commission for Organizational and Statutory Questions of the LCY, that the LCY, in the precongress period and in the elections which have already started in several republics, can stimulate others by its example, as it has done in the past.

The Key to Structure

To a remark that national, class, social, sexual, old-age and other aspects of structure cannot be provided by a secret vote involving more candidates, Branko Mikulic, at a meeting of the Commission for Organizational and Statutory Questions, responded:

"This can be easily created by a convention. For example, out of a group of clerks, the one who receives the most votes wins, out of a group of workers the one with the most votes also wins; however, the worker who wins may have even fewer votes than, for example, the clerk who lost."

'WITCH-HUNT' CITED IN PRESS REPORTING ON RELIGION

Zagreb VJESNIK in Serbo-Croatian 28 Nov 81 SEDAM DANA p 14

[Article by Nenad Ivankovic: "Religious Affairs in a Counterproductive Cycle"]

[Text] A few days ago, responding to the question of Vatican Radio (a program in Croatian) as to what he thinks "about the recent attacks on our Ivan (Merc) in the domestic public press and would that perhaps hurt his process (for beatification)," Father Bozidar Nagy said: "You will perhaps be surprised if I say that not only will this not hurt, but it will be beneficial. This has given him a great deal of publicity, and now many people are interested in him who had never heard of him before. Numerous orders are coming in for his books and literature about him."

These remarks undoubtedly deserve a certain attention, since it is indeed true that there was no basis for all those adverse things uttered in recent months about Ivan Merc in a portion of our public press, and for that reason the "paper" campaign was actually counterproductive. It is certainly not our point that certain individuals or tendencies should not be written about solely because this could contribute to their popularity, but that what is said about them should be well founded and full responsibility should be borne for words uttered in public. And certainly this should be done when the reasons are good and sound.

Recently, however, opposed tendencies have been noted in certain of our newspapers (when it comes to the public issues of religion and the activity of the religious communities): ignorance and irresponsibility. As though, if we can so put it, people have become persuaded that no wrong can be done if blows are being struck against certain ecclesiastical values (and not uncommonly against religious values as well). What is more, they seem to believe that they will also receive public applause for this. Isn't there eloquent evidence of this in the fact that a portion of the press writes about these issues only from the angle of cases in which there has been a lack of restraint, while they are silent about a number of constructive facts, since supposedly they are not "attractive" enough? (Of course, there is in all this a certain amount of completely conscious raising of dust in "the yard next door" so as to "ensure" peace in one's own yard.)

Chimeric Criticism

And this unquestionably detracts from social policy in this area, since the impression is given that the representatives of these tendencies are at the same time exponents of official policy. So that instead of commitment to the fundamental achievements of this sociopolitical community being the actual line of demarcation (and then also the point of opposition and computation), by the logic of newspaper escapades of this kind, it appears at times that it is, for example, Ivan Merc.

And truly, should we allow Ivan Merc or any other unimportant person or fact to become our public touchstone? And allow some newsman (how absurd!) to publicly admonish the entire leadership of a republic on this basis for not having already put certain people on "slim rations"!

And finally, what is achieved by this "policy"? Father Bozidar Nagy concluded his guest appearance on Vatican Radio with these words: "Untruths of this kind, whose purpose is to manipulate an insufficiently informed reading public, not only offend the religious sentiments of citizens, but also arouse those who are not religious to ask themselves the justified question: "How much truth is there, then, in those other writings and attacks on the church and its people, which have unfortunately become more frequent in our press of late?" Of course, we do not intend to concern ourselves with the purport of Father Nagy's thought expressed in this way (though there are things which might be said), but we wish to call attention to the counterproductive nature of unscrupulous and chimeric social criticism, if the name at all applies to this kind of criticism.

One thing is certain: Ivan Merc will be used for a long time as a strong, so to put it, psychological argument in an attempt to defuse as well all that relevant and principled social criticism which has been uttered concerning certain tendencies within the church in recent months and which will continue to be relevant. At the same time, it will also be a welcome pretext for clericalistic circles to push a new (irrelevant, but equally dangerous for all that) differentiation (and for the sectarians to take it up), thus creating a new vicious cycle of unnecessary social tensions.

We have thus arrived at a point from which it is quite obvious where this crusade is leading. After all, one thing is certain: it does not lead toward a constructive relationship between, if we may so put it, Christianity and Marxism (of which the joint construction of socialism, this socialism which we have here and now, is a practical consequence), a relationship that would constitute a dialogue and those things which would make that dialogue possible, but leads toward a frontal collision and conflict. Which is exactly what is desired by the retrograde forces in both the church and in society. This is probably the only point on which they agree, as has been borne out by numerous examples.

The Constructive Forces

The dangers of this newspaper "witch-hunt" which has become current in the recent past are also manifested in this circumstance: that is, its protagonists, we believe, are nevertheless unaware of all these consequences. What is more, we would say that they are actually giving evidence of their social "orthodoxy" and that in undertaking this kind of "involvement" they are "on the line." (Much like our university professor and public figure who, thinking probably that he was advocating a Marxist thesis, declared a few days ago that "religion is in and of itself based on fear of mysterious, unknown and invisible forces, on submission to them, and indeed on superstition"!?!)

Which brings us to the next point: Should people be concerned with this problem area (and we, of course, are not confining ourselves to the field of journalism) who do not know a miter from a chasuble or a rosary from a pectoral. Or, on the other hand, should personnel be found who will know how to be responsible and well founded in their public activity.

Of course, we are aware that a mere knowledge of the subject matter is not everything, but still knowledge does free one of the prejudices of ignorance. Which is to say, to paraphrase Monseigneur Edelby, that it is not wise to honor with immediate condemnation every silly fool who utters something stupid.

These critical remarks are not, of course, aimed at suppressing or toning down socially justified and principled confrontation of and opposition to all the relevant and negative tendencies that emerge within the various religious communities and which will unquestionably be manifested for a long time yet. It is precisely out of an awareness of the latter fact that we appeal for a social criticism that will not, so to speak, destroy its own effectiveness by being maladroit, but will strengthen and follow up that effectiveness. We also believe that external criticism, however principled and "devastating," is still not sufficient, and that internal criticism should be "assisted." But we certainly will not achieve it unless we create social conditions which by their own particular logic will bring to the fore within the church itself those constructive forces which exist in it even today and which are neither small nor insignificant. After all, we should not forget that the church is a living organism which is not immune to the world around it and that often the internal balance of power is a kind of reflection of certain circumstances in society.

Nor, then, can it be a matter of indifference to us whether various participants in public affairs act responsibly and competently or contaminate public policy with their activity and discourage the constructive forces within the church.

MISUSE OF EARTHQUAKE RELIEF FUNDS DESCRIBED

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1610, 8 Nov 81 pp 19-20

[Article by Petar Ignja]

[Text] Yugoslav society has given 10 billion (old) dinars as aid to the stricken residents of Kursumlija opstina, who were hit by the Kopaonik earthquake. "The opstina fathers" divided up half the total among their unharmed friends.

Generally, the Kursumlija case is known to the public. Part of the money, which Yugoslav society gave to assist those who suffered in the Kopaonik earthquake, found its way into the pockets of those whose property had not suffered the slightest harm from the earthquake, because of the involvement of influential people in the opstina assembly. Today, people laugh bitterly and ask how private cafe owner Milan Milosavljevic from Kastrat received loan credit intended solely for repairing damages caused by the earthquake, even though it is well known that his house had simply burned down from other causes. How? Simply, on the basis of an invented record.

But let us begin at the beginning. We would remind the reader that the Kursumlija opstina was hit by an earthquake on 18 May of last year. The villages below Kopaonik mountain in general were damaged, for the epicenter was somewhere in the opstina of Brus. The Serbian executive council gave Kursumlija opstina 5 billion old dinars from the "solidarity fund," and those 5 billion went properly to those who had suffered the most damage. And then responsible officials of the opstina assembly, probably operating on the principle that when someone is giving, you should take as much as possible, requested that the Serbian executive council give another 5 billion dinars. They got that money too, and at that point there was enough money to develop a system of manipulation.

Personal Commissions

After the earthquake, the city of Nis tried to help Kursumlija opstina by sending a specialized, experienced team to assess damages. Those poeple did their task honestly (with the healthy prerequisite that because of their specialized skills and their neutrality, they could be expected to do so), and they transmitted their findings to the Kursumlija opstina assembly. How did responsible officials at the Kursumlija opstina assembly react to this brotherly aid from Nis? They simply thanked them for the cooperation as a preliminary, and rejected the findings of the Nis commission and relied (with foresight) on themselves and their own ability.

They formed at least ten local commissions that were headed by some sort of construction engineer for each one, largely technical people, and to these were added at least someone to keep the records. Thus equipped, they set out to assess the damages suffered at Kursumlija. Malicious tongues assert that many of the assessments were made at cafes or in offices.

The Nis commission established that at most three houses in the city itself were severely damaged by the earthquake; the local commissions multiplied this number into more than 3 hundred!

This fact says enough about the reason why the opstina functionaries of Kursumlija did not accept the work of the specialists from Nis.

Some other numbers will help the reader to understand everything that happened in Kursumlija. In the opstina 1931 loans were made, with the city and immediate surrounding area receiving 1040 loans and the city of Kursumlija itself, 371. Investigative judge Ljubinko Popovic, who later carried out the overall investigation aimed at establishing criminal responsibility said quickly in passing (since he was leaving for new duties in Nis) that the basic fact was that some part of the money went where it was intended, while a good part of it was distributed in Kursumlija itself, where not a single window was broken.

There is reliable evidence to show that 891 houses in Kussumlija opstina were damaged. Simple mathematics can show that more than half the loans were given without any justification at all. We would say that it is a matter of 5 billion old dinars, of which according to official data, the city of Kursumlija got 1.6 billion.

The readers will certainly be interested to know who resisted this dishonesty. The war veterans. The opstina Federation of Veterans' Organizations of the National Liberation War reacted to the entire presidium, and sent petitions to republic sociopolitical organizations.

We asked Miodrag Ilic, president of the Kursumlija LCY opstina conference, why the League of Communists did not react in a timely manner. The answer: "This happened during party elections."

When those who were caught in the affair began to retreat, as in some action film, some unseen hands disposed of both the records of the Nis commission and certain other suspicious records of the local damage-assessment commissions. The opstina investigative judge says that he did his part of the job, but since large amounts of money were involved, everything was turned over to the district public prosecutor in Prokuplje, as required by law. It remains to be seen, what form a complaint will take and whether it will eventually come to a trial in court. We cannot make all the facts public because it is still early, and the findings of the continuing investigation remain confidential. Legal proceedings have, however, been initiated to determine political responsibility, and those most responsible have been punished. Those punishments are another story in themselves.

The Serbia LCY opstina committee and the presidium of the veterans' organization opstina council in Kursumlija held a joint session on 19 June 1981 to consider the report of the opstina assembly commission, the executive council commission, and the investigative judge of the Kursumlija opstina court on irregularities in the procedures for assessing damages and making loans to restore damages of the earthquake. The conclusions are clear: The commissions involved in assessing damages were unqualified, there were no damages from the earthquake in Kursumlija and the villages outside of the directly threatened region, and the loans intended to repair destroyed and damaged houses were distributed without any proper criteria. There were many irregularities and abuses throughout the process.

It was also proposed that the Kursumlija opstina assembly, as the responsible agency, should pass a resolution calling for the return of the loans that have been made.

About Punishments

The opstina assembly has accepted that proposal. Even the delegates who received loans "through connections" voted for it, and the date for repayment was set at 1 October. Yet nobody has yet returned a loan. The date was recently extended to 1 November. It remains to be seen as to whether a massive rush to return those loans will take place.

[Inset No 1, p 20] "What in fact is expected by the request of the basic LCY organization of the administrative agency of the Kursumlija opstina assembly, asking that the LCY committee deliver the stenographic record of its session to that organization." This question was asked by Dr Zivota Zivkovic, secretary of the presidium of the Nis LCY local organization committee, in a discussion at a committee session. "It wishes to see what particular individuals had to say in the discussion and then to attach the overall set of problems to particular persons and interpersonal relationships. Such attempts to divide up the committee have already been made. For this reason, the basic LCY organization is not turning over its records, so that the committee cannot see what healthy forces it can rely on and what other forces are hindering action. Such attempts at collusion must be disarmed."
[Reported in NISKE NOVINE (Nis News)]

[Main text] Punishments have also been suggested for those most responsible. It is proposed that a final warning before expulsion be addressed to the assembly president, Dragisa Ilic (reliable evidence shows that his four brothers and his father all got loans, although supposedly the president himself did not). A similar disciplinary measure would be aimed at several other responsible officials of the opstina assembly. But the suggestion of the opstina committee was only a suggestion. The basic LCY organization of the Kursumlija opstina assembly had a different opinion: according to their party comrades, for all they had done the leaders deserved only--a comradely reprimand! The opstina committee came back onto the scene, and, utilizing the rights of democratic centralism, carried out the discipline it had suggested. It was asserted that the opstina president could not remain in his function, and supposedly, a delegate motion for his removal was initiated.

[Inset No 2, p 20] How the Assessors Were "Punished"

The people who worked in the commissions for determining damages (and the text indicates how they performed their task) also were given party disciplinary punishments. They received--comradely criticism. It would be funny, if it were not so pitiful.

[Main text] We asked Miodrag Ilic, president of the LCY opstina conference, about the penalties. Did he feel that such people could remain in the party? The man said that his opinion is nothing more than one man's voice, but that the decision on punishment was not approved unanimously, but on a 6 votes for and 4 votes against tally. He admitted that there are people who regard these penalties as Draconian measures!

And so that is what happened at Kursumlija, even though a final period has not been placed on the affair. What do the people who were directly involved in this dishonest work of taking advantage of human misfortune have to say about all this? We could not reach them for comment. Some were not at their jobs, others were not in Kursumlija. We had neither the time nor the strength to chase them down. If they have anything to say, certainly any newspaper would give them space to say it.

We did, however, learn that Modzo Milosavljevic, of Kosanicka Raca, had come to the opstina assembly office "regarding housing." His house had been determined to be dangerous for habitation and this man asked "the state" to let him use the tent for a while longer (the date for returning it had already passed). He would try to find some accommodation with his brother or other relatives. Midzo Milosavljevic of Raca had not received a loan.

OFFICIAL REPORTS ON MEETING OF BLOC IDEOLOGISTS

Budapest PARTELET in Hungarian No 12, 1981 pp 3-10

[Article by Tamas Palos, deputy department head of the Central Committee: "Policy of the Communists--Peace, Progress and Socialism"]

[Text] Everyone who spoke said the convening of the conference held on 3-4 November 1981 in Moscow by the ideological and international affairs secretaries of the Central Committees of the communist and workers parties in 11 socialist countries[1] was timely and important. Important because the fraternal parties regarded it as necessary to discuss and evaluate the world political developments which have occurred since the last conference (in Berlin, July 1979), to exchange their experiences in ideological work, and to strengthen the cooperation which has developed in the internal class struggle. Timely because quite a few new developments were awaiting discussion and analysis, and the fraternal parties wanted to designate the main lines and concrete goals for uniting their efforts on the basis of the most recent observations. On one hand, the participants in the conference saw the altered conditions of recent times in that the international situation had become to a large extent more strained and, on the other hand, as they put it in their communique, "the continuous development of the world of socialism and its building work have placed new tasks before the communist and workers parties of the socialist countries."

At the end of the conference, the terms "important" and "timely" were supplemented by a new word of appreciation: the delegates referred to a "useful" conference. This can be explained by the fact that the talks achieved their goal, because at the high level of Central Committee secretaries, 11 communist and workers parties had:

--coordinated their evaluation of the world political situation;

--affirmed the unchanged reality and importance of the earlier peace proposals and initiatives of the socialist countries;

--discussed timely questions regarding the cooperation of the participating fraternal parties in the struggle for peace, socialism and social progress;

1. The Bulgarian Communist Party, the CSSR Communist Party, the Cuban Communist Party, the Laos Revolutionary People's Party, the Polish United Workers Party, Communist Party, the Hungarian Socialist Workers Party, the Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party, the GDR Socialist Unity Party, the Romanian Communist Party, the Soviet Union Communist Party, and the Vietnamese Communist Party.

--formulated the concept that the parties represented at the conference are prepared to cooperate in the most urgent problems of the present time and in the guarding of peace with everyone who joins in the effort to continue the process of detente and put an end to the arms race;

--become familiar with one another's experiences in respect to how they will further develop the theory of Marxism-Leninism and its propagation in a creative way, and how they will strengthen certain elements of general socialist thinking;

--expressed the determination of the parties regarding active participation in the international ideological struggle and their readiness to broaden cooperation in the interest of popularizing the ideas of communism and peace in opposition to the reactionary bourgeois ideology and propaganda that is hostile to socialism.

As reported in the press announcement, all these things took place in an atmosphere of fraternal friendship and unity. Behind these things is the significant fact that the communist and workers parties working on various continents of the earth and in varying situations on the direct solution of tasks have taken a unified position on the questions that were discussed, which, as is evident, are very important. Of course, even at this conference this was accompanied by a variety of views and opinions that is natural considering the above-mentioned conditions. But it also happened that among the 11 delegations only 10 were able to join in a joint declaration in defense of Cuba because the representatives of the Romanian Communist Party did not wish to take part in this action.

On balance, the Moscow Conference was a successful continuation of the series of conferences held regularly since December 1973 with the participation of the ideological and foreign affairs secretaries of the central committees. At the present, the seventh, conference, the leader of the Hungarian delegation, Miklos Ovari, could state in a well-founded manner: "We shall make broad use of the results in the domestic and international propaganda work of our party." On basis of the delegation's report, his words have been affirmed since then by the leading party body.

The leading party politicians of the socialist countries stated unanimously at the conference that in the present world situation many elements of detente and tension are present. At foreign political presentations, however, it is frequently asked whether we can still speak of detente. We can firmly reply with a yes. Not only because no change has occurred in the basic factor resulting in detente, in the power relations, but also because the achievements of detente have been permanently built into the relations among states, and the warlike powers have not been able to uproot these. And the subjective bases of detente, the unflagging efforts of the progressive forces for peace and their global repercussions continue to be forceful in guarding the results achieved by way of detente and in continuing on this course.

Together with the existence of detente, it is a fact that in recent years the international situation has become more strained and the political victories of the detente which unfolded in the 1970's are in danger. As the cause of this, they unanimously pointed out the following at the Moscow Conference:

1. Let us first look at the facts.

The new United States government announced as soon as it assumed power that it would reject the ratification of the SALT II Treaty.

The capitalist countries are impeding by every means they can that agreement at the Madrid Conference should come about in respect to the expansion of the zone of confidence-building measures and in respect to calling a conference on European military detente and disarmament.

The NATO countries regard the Central European discussions in Vienna on reductions in force as being deadlocked.

The United States and its allies have rejected the Soviet proposal for a moratorium on the placing of medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe.

2. In the meantime, on the other hand:

NATO has made a decision on the placement of new-type nuclear missiles in Europe.

The American President has decided on beginning the serial production of neutron bombs.

In the Pentagon budget alone, military goals will be increased next year by more than $40 billion, and thus will come to $226 billion. By 1986, the United States is planning to spend $1.5 trillion for this purpose.

Organization of the American rapid deployment force is proceeding at a forced pace, and in the middle of November in the "Bright Star '82" military exercise framework it already tried out in the Middle East those forces which the United States is inclined to use against any people "in the defense of its global interests."

The United States has declared its willingness to deliver modern American weapons, military technical means and technologies to China.

3. As we could read in the Moscow announcement, all this was accompanied by the effort of:

--"the imperialists to intervene in the internal affairs of the socialist states and other countries and seek to disintegrate the socialist community";

--"the imperialists and their allies to incite and support reactionary forces in Latin America, the Caribbean countries, the Middle East, in the southern part of Africa, in the horn of Africa, in Southeast and South Asia, and in other areas of the world."

4. All of the above-mentioned actions have been accompanied by large-scale propaganda. According to the statement of the fraternal parties, "In order to lay an ideological smokescreen over their own activities, the militarist groups are loudly circulating baseless fabrications about "the Soviet military threat."

Under this pretext they are conducting an unbridled ideological and propaganda campaign not only against the socialist countries but in effect against every revolutionary and fighter for national liberation and peace. They present the broad-scale and mounting antiwar movements in the capitalist countries, which are socially and politically manifold, as if they were organized from the outside and were antithetical to the national interests of the countries."

In light of the Moscow Conference there are at present four main lines of activity we face from the aggressive forces of imperialism:

--the hindering of negotiations;
--unbridled armament;
--the damaging of relations among states;
--anticommunist, antidetente propaganda.

And the deduction from all this is that a dangerous change has taken place in the foreign policy of the United States and thus in its international attitude regarding the cause of detente and world peace. The greatest danger is represented by that concept of the extreme circles of imperialism that the interests of the capitalist world can be realized only by acquiring military superiority and upsetting the balance.

The ideological and foreign affairs secretaries of the central committees seek an answer not only to what has happened in the imperialist camp, but also the reasons therefore. In general, three conditions were discussed.

First, those forces have taken over political power in the United States which are linked more closely than anything heretofore to the military-industrial complex, and they represent those interests to the extreme. These firms manufacture weapons in great volume for army orders and pocket tremendous profits in the sale of weapons of mass destruction. For example, the MX missiles represent a $33 billion order, the cruise missiles a $4 billion order, the system of nuclear submarines equipped with Trident missiles an $11 billion order, and the new-type strategic bombers a $12 billion order.

Furthermore, American concerns gain great profits from weapons exports. According to data in FORTUNE Magazine, the leading U.S. military industrial firms are also the largest exporters. Among these are General Dynamics, Lockheed, Boeing, McDonnel-Douglas, and so forth. But military industrial enterprises in other NATO countries have also revived markedly.

Secondly, certain capitalist circles see the way out of the crisis of capitalism in a more aggressive policy because it is in this way that they would like to guard or gain their domination over areas rich in energy sources and raw materials. And they see a means therein of torpedoing the revolutionary process by way of a ruthless fight against the left wing in their own countries and harshly opposing the forces of progress, peace, and national liberation.

Thirdly, imperialism hopes to acquire military superiority over socialism, thereby weakening the positions of socialism and the favorable effect it has exercised on world development. It is from here that the power politics of imperialism emerge and those doctrines which change with the times but are always essentially the same, such as, "mass retaliation," "rolling back" and so forth. This also incites them to warlike extortion and to an arms race, among other things, in the calculation that in this way they will succeed in economically "exhausting" socialism and burying its social stability.

In their policy of raising tensions and bringing about confrontations, the leading circles of imperialism are giving an increasingly greater role to the European theater. Recently in this connection, the American President made his frightening announcement on the possibility of a limited nuclear war on the continent. To make a realistic judgment of the European situation, it is worthwhile to note the duality latent in the West European attitude. On one hand, it is obvious that the class interests of the United States and of the European capitalist countries are the same, and in fact from the viewpoint of the defense of their allegedly threatened social system they are interested in a "strong America" and the maintenance of its large Western armament potential. But on the other hand, from the viewpoint of their situation, endowments, possibilities, and, finally, their own interests, they calculate more carefully the realities of the world and of Europe, and therefore in many respects they do not follow American thinking and give voice to different views and endeavors.

However, the bourgeois propaganda which maintains that the socialist countries are "speculating" on differences between the United States and Western Europe is false. The socialist countries do not wish to incite differences of view; their interest is that progress and peace should be victorious in the whole world, including Europe.

The international strains are increasing the foreign political measures of the Chinese leadership and their open collaboration with the extreme, aggressive circles of imperialism. By virtue of the coincidence or convergence of political concepts, a Chinese-American political collaboration has developed which endangers the world, including the peace of Asia. The representative of the Vietnamese Communist Party spoke of this very graphically when he pointed out: "In Southeast Asia, Beijing's strategy is directed at weakning and then annexing Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia and thereby opening a new path to gaining domination over the entire area." To this end, it is constantly provoking Vietnam militarily, conducting psychological warfare against it, and doing everything to disrupt its economic life. It attacks Laos in a similar way. Against Cambodia, to quote the Vietnamese delegate--"it has started an undeclared war which consists of three elements: Chinese command and weapons--Thailand border country--Pol Pot bands." In all these matters, Beijing finds allies in the United States, Japan, and the ASEAN countries. On balance, the conference summarized the mainsprings of present imperialist policy as follows: "It is endeavoring to continue its colonial and neocolonial policy, oppress the people, and to stop and choke off movements that are struggling for national and social liberation. All this is related to the deep economic crisis of the capitalist world and the unprecedented sharpening of social and political contradictions. It shows that in the interest of overcoming its own crisis imperialism will not recoil even from foreign political adventurism, and it seeks to shift the burdens of the crisis onto the backs of the people."

The communist and workers parties of all socialist countries reacted at the Moscow Conference to the above-mentioned changes in imperialist policy as they have at recently held party congresses, or as we have seen at the various forums of the Warsaw Pact: resolutely, consistently, moderately and calmly, with the interest of peace in mind. Again they showed that they are aware of their great responsibility because, as they emphasized, "the socialist community is the main factor in keeping the peace and solidifying security." Accordingly, they recommended to the attention of their foes and partners that "the foreign political proposals and initiatives of the Warsaw Pact states and other socialist countries have represented an alternative of a type building a peace program for the 1980's, as compared to the aggressive lines of American imperialism and its allies."

One of the pronouncements of the Moscow Conference which evoked a large reaction was that it vouched for the complete openness of the communist and workers parties of the socialist countries toward all those forces which advocate peace.

Among these, the policies of the new, independent states of Africa, Asia, and Latin America are acquiring an increasingly more prominent and greater influence. There are already more than 100 states which are following a peace-loving foreign political direction. These states which have chiefly selected the path of socialist development, have resolutely made themselves heard in the United Nations and other international forums. The movement of the nonaligned nations, which brings together most of the liberated countries, contributes to an important degree to the defense of peace and to the restraining of the arms race.

A very important part of the peace potential consists of the general democratic antiwar movement. Today this movement is again being strengthened and given greater and greater impetus, which is particularly striking in the West European countries.

What are the causes of this? On one hand, the fact that American policy is making people more and more uneasy; and on the other hand, the effect of the peace-loving initiatives of the socialist countries, which reveal the real possibilities for eliminating the danger of war.

Various political forces have linked into the antiwar movement. These include the communist parties, important circles of social democracy, and the environmental-protection movement. A more important factor is the working class and the trade movement. The working class already senses that the weight of the militarization of the economy will fall on its shoulders with the increase in inflation and unemployment, the rise in taxes, and the reduction of funds for socioeconomic goals. They are active in many bourgeois political parties, including certain circles of parties belonging to government coalitions. It is characteristic that in the antiwar movement an increasingly greater role is being assumed by respected military leaders who filled high posts in the army of their country or the headquarters staff of NATO. The realistic-thinking members of the ruling classes in the capitalist countries also advocate the avoidance of nuclear war.

Under present-day conditions, the antiwar movement frequently assumes an international, continental character. An example of this is the Peace March '81, which started in Copenhagen on 22 June, passed through the territories of the FRG, the Netherlands, Belgium, and marched into Paris.

The Moscow Conference well reflected the fact that the fraternal parties have attributed, in the more strained international situation, an exceptionally outstanding importance to the stability of the socialist community, its unity, and its coordinated and manifold international presence. They are endeavoring to have their international cooperation strengthened in every area of life for the benefit of the socialist community as a whole and for every single member. The bilateral meetings held this summer in Crimea, including the talks between Janos Kadar and Leonic Ilyitch Brezhnev, provided important guides on the road to the realization of common goals. It was confirmed that the further development of the economic cooperation conducted in the CEMA framework, the increased efficiency of the institutional system and the deepening of socialist economic integration was of special importance for every country. In fact, in face of the increasing threats of imperialism, the defense capability of the Warsaw Pact could be maintained at the requisite level only by making economic cooperation more efficient.

In their comments, the representatives of the fraternal parties also dealt with the Polish events. To summarize what was said, we may formulate as their joint position a strengthening of their solidarity with the communists of socialist Poland and all Polish patriots. They support their struggle against the counterrevolution and the antipeople forces of anarchy, for the overcoming of the crisis, the consolidation of socialism, the leading role in society of the PZPR, and the development of the Polish People's Republic as a solid member of the socialist community. In this regard it was said: bourgeois propaganda seeks to show the Polish crisis as "the crisis of socialism" and the failure of "the Soviet model." But the troubles were not caused by the fact that the Polish leaders allegedly followed blindly "the Soviet model," but by the fact that they deviated from the principles of building socialism which had proved successful for decades. To be sure, these principles require that by taking realistically into account the national endowments and characteristics of their countries, the communist parties should strictly adhere to the Leninist norms of party life, consider carefully solidifying their relations with the masses and the improvement of socialist democracy, conduct a realistic economic policy, educate the workers in an internationalist spirit, bear witness to a revolutionary vigilance and oppose antisocialist forces in a firm and timely way.

In solving their domestic and international tasks, the countries of the socialist community can count on the energetic support of the others, the participants in the conference stated. To buttress this stance, they discussed and established that according to congressional resolutions it is an unchanged and timely task to strengthen cooperation among the parties on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and the principles of proletarian internationalism. And to make sure that they were unified in interpretation, the participants repeatedly stressed: "These principles in themselves include full equal rights, respect for independence and sovereignty, nonintervention in domestic affairs, solidarity and mutual assistance."

Given the nature of the conference, there was a great deal of discussion of the fact that the place and role of the ideological fight has increased in the international struggle. This may be regarded as an objective phenomenon because the conflicting class interests of the working class and the bourgeois confront each other also on the ideological front, and the international class struggle includes in itself the ideological struggle. But this is also true in a national framework.

We must speak of this clearly nowadays because the United States and all of NATO is waging a propaganda campaign of extreme incitement against the socialist community, and primarily against the Soviet Union, the communist parties, the national democratic and liberation movements and the peace forces. It masks its activity prejudicially with ideological slogans. Nevertheless, it is evident that international imperialism has turned to ideological undermining work for directly political goals, the arresting of detente, the upsetting of the strategic balance, and the insistence on armaments. It is striving not for an open battle but for the misleading of international public opinion including that of its own population. In this, it exploits the internal and external difficulties of the socialist world system.

Undoubtedly in the present tense international situation, the conditions of propaganda and information work are more complicated. In addition to the wildly anticommunist, antisocialist and antiprogressive propaganda of the imperialist power centers, we must also reckon with ultraradical, psuedoleft and Maoist propaganda.

We need a propaganda that is on the offensive where we can build on the moral, political, social, economic and military strengths behind our international efforts and which are available to the socialist world system. We can also make use of the opportunity presented by the fact that interest in the ideas of socialism and its practice continues to grow in the nonsocialist world. And we can also rely on the circumstance that the peoples of the world are becoming more and more aware of the actual danger that threatens their peace and security. Despite political and ideological differences, more and more people regard it as important to seek that which binds them together in the struggle for peace and disarmament. Consequently, they are receptive to all those calls which mobilize for disarmament, for the restraining of armaments and for the prevention of war.

Under these circumstances, such tasks come to the forefront of the international information work of the socialist countries as convincingly show and popularize their foreign political line and their peace policy and unmask the armament policy and the antidetente line represented by the imperialist circles. The present situation requires propaganda which will help make it clear that gone are the times when "the powerful of this world" decide on matters of war and peace. The situation requires the dispersion of illusions that all can be settled in the negotiation rooms of international conferences. Everyone must be aware of the fact that he too is responsible for the fate of peace.

The program for ideological cooperation was enhanced further at the Moscow Conference. The guiding idea of the concrete agreements was that we must study mutually and more deeply, apply and circulate creatively those rich experiences which the socialist countries have gained in solving important economic and social problems, in realizing the leading role of the party, in developing socialist democracy and statehood, and in ideological educational work.

They dealt separately with the question of what they might do in strengthening the unity of their countries and parties in the means of mass information. They expressed the view that one of their important tasks was socialist economic integration, production cooperation realized in bilateral relations and a more multilateral and systematic familiarity with technical-scientific cooperation. By this means, mass communications should be an example of relations among free and independent peoples and contribute to their more rapid advance toward socialism and communism. The participants in the conference emphasized that it is necessary to broaden and strengthen the mutual informing of public opinion regarding results of their countries, in order that the many sided cooperation of their peoples should be strengthened.

The MSZMP delegation[2] which on the basis of its authorization participated actively in the work of the conference, also urged further development of cooperation among the socialist countries and the communist parties. It evaluated the basic processes and phenomena of the international situation in harmony with the fraternal parties, and it outlined several of the more important characteristics of the carrying out of the 12th Congress resolutions. It especially dwelt on how important we regard it that we should speak better and more convincingly in our ideological work of the prospects for peace, analyze the international positions of socialism and progress more deeply, and explain more vigorously their determining role in the development of international relations. At the same time, we must reveal more deeply the present-day characteristics of social development. It is important for us to reason with more credibility, with greater conviction on behalf of our principles, plans, their long-range foundations and their reality. In our ideological work, a continuingly essential task is a deeper and more creditable analysis of our practice in building socialism and its propaganda.

The MSZMP delegation assured the delegations present at the conference that our party will be in the future, too, a participant in bilateral and multilateral ideological cooperation between the communist and workers parties. This position was affirmed at the 3 December session of the Central Committee. In this sense, it is the task of party organs, organizations and institutions active in every area of ideological work to utilize the experiences of the Moscow Conference in socialist building work and in the struggles waged in the international arena. The whole system of means in agitation and propaganda work seeks to help in this task.

PROPER ROLE, ACTIVITIES OF PARTY ORGANS DISCUSSED

Tirana ZERI I POPULLIT in Albanian 23 Dec 81 pp 2-3

[Article by Thimi Nika: "The Party--A Leading Force of Our Socialist Society and State"]

[Excerpts] The 8th Congress of the Albanian Workers Party gave special attention to increasing and uninterruptedly perfecting the leading role of the party, tasks which are closely allied with the development and further expansion of the revolution in all fields and the complete building of the socialist society. The report presented by Comrade Enver Hoxha at this Congress is a document with great political and ideological importance and is another contribution of inestimable value not only for the defense but also for the further enrichment of the Marxist-Leninist doctrine of the party of the working class, that party which V.I. Lenin called "the thought, the honor and the conscience of our times."

In Albania, the party directs the entire life of the country. Our party has been and remains a revolutionary party, because during its entire history, strongly relying on Marxist-Leninist doctrine, on the laws of the materialistic development of society, it has worked out and executed a correct, pure and crystal-clear line, in complete accord with the interests of the working class and the other working masses. This line has enabled the party to orient itself well in every situation, no matter how difficult and complicated, to understand the present, to foresee the future, to devise and execute a revolutionary strategy and tactic at all times, to consistently carry on the class struggle against foreign and domestic enemies, among the people and in its own ranks.

In order to ensure its leading role everywhere and at all times, our party has always resolutely implemented the principle of the class struggle. It has shattered and caused the shameful defeat of all the diabolical plans and efforts of its many and varied enemies, both domestic and foreign, who, in order to bring about the degeneration of the socialist system, have directed their attacks, in particular, against the party and against its leading role. In the process of this struggle, the Albanian Workers Party has amassed a rich revolutionary experience, with great theoretical and practical value, from which it has drawn very important lessons and conclusions in regard to the protection and construction of socialism and the strengthening of the party of the dictatorship of the proletariat. Our party has always waged the class struggle correctly and without mistakes, according to the teachings of Marxism-Leninism, taking a principled stand in every situation, not falling into opportunism or sectarianism. While successfully waging the class struggle, it has continually increased and strengthened its leading role in the entire life of the country, and it has executed great duties on the glorious road of the building of socialism and the defense of the fatherland.

The 8th party congress assigned the duty of forming a clearer and more complete concept in regard to the execution of the leading role of the party in all links and in every field. In order to achieve this, the Congress stressed, it is necessary to struggle against narrow understandings of this matter, which are reflected in the erroneous opinion that "only the leading organs and apparatuses make up the party," not the great organized masses of all Communists. There have been cases where, on the basis of the principle that "the party directs everything," some people have involved the party organizations and committees and their directors in the concrete resolution of minor problems of production, administration, technology, etc. These attitudes show an obvious misunderstanding of the fact that the party leadership is, first of all, a political and ideological leadership and the party organizations should carry on a broad ideological and political activity for the theoretical and practical analysis of directives and decisions in order to make workers conscientious about executing them. Of course, the leadership of the party is also practical and concrete. Therefore, the most correct combining of all sides, with priority being given to the political and ideological aspects, which makes it possible to achieve a deep understanding of the correct execution of the leadership of the party, will stop the monopolization of work, the stifling of the initiative of the cadres and the masses, the duplication and displacement of party levers, and the weakening and withering away of the leading role of the party.

The sole and undivided leadership of the party and the revolutionary implementation of this principle have nothing in common with the monopolization of works and duties by its organs and basic organizations. The monopolization of works has negative consequences and leads to various distortions, to lack of confidence in the party levers and to their undermining. Protective attitudes and flaunting of authority also have negative consequences. Therefore, they should be severely combatted whenever and wherever they appear.

Of course, the party organizations cannot do all this by itself. Therefore, they put their levers into action; they charge them with concrete duties, they guide them and monitor them and require that they give reports on the exact execution of their duties. Therefore, it is very important that the party organs and organizations achieve the best possible collaboration with the levers for the execution of the tasks of the party.

The party has many levers and has trained a large army of cadres. It has assigned duties, powers and responsibilities to all; it guides and monitors them and asks for reports from them. But each one has full responsibility for its own work. But what has been happening on some occasions? As the 8th party congress revealed, there have been incorrect tendencies on the part of some state and economic organs. In the name of ensuring the leading role of the party, they have been asking the permission of party organizations and forums for everything. They have been attempting to legitimize their activities. Such attitudes have nothing to do with ensuring the leading role of the party forums and organizations but are motivated by a desire to share responsibility with these groups; therefore they should be severely combatted and the party organizations should not permit such things.

The range of issues with which the party organs and organizations are concerned is very broad. It covers political, ideological, economic, cultural, and defense problems and the entire life of the country. But, in the name of leadership and management, these groups should not become involved in details, in minor matters or in matters which the party has delegated to the governmental organs, the economic organs or its other levers, for solution.

The work of the party is, above all, work with individuals, work to educate, enlighten, mobilize and organize them. This makes it possible for the party to successfully carry out its main leadership function and, at the same time, it eliminates a great danger for a party in power--its transformation into an operating organism with state functions, a danger which the party has always combatted and has not allowed to appear.

The 40-year experience of the party and the documents of the 8th party congress prove the correctness and vitality of the Marxist-Leninist teaching that the more the revolution progresses and expands, the more the leading role of the party should be strengthened and perfected in every sphere of life and of state and social activity. At the same time, it is a crushing blow against the "theories" of the disciples of the bourgeoisie and against revisionism, such as those on the reduction of the role of the party to a "means of ideological influence," on the "party of all the people," on "political pluralism," "the great and single democratic party," etc, whose aim is to leave the working class without its conscientious vanguard in the revolution and in socialist construction. History has relegated these "theories" to the dustbin.

HUNGARIAN AIRLINE CRASH AT PRAGUE RUZYNE AIRPORT TOLD

Prague MLADA FRONTA in Czech 22 Oct 81 p 7

[Text] Prague (from our reporters)--Yesterday, the air traffic at the Prague Ruzyne airport was flowing at its accustomed rhythm and speed as any other day. Planes landing and taking off in all directions were taking their turns on runway 31. At 14.19 hours, a Hungarian MALEV Airline aircraft, a scheduled Amsterdam-Prague-Budapest flight 641, was making its approach. The weather around the capital reflected a typical autumn day. Low clouds and haze were reducing visibility, a situation which no pilot appreciates. The crew to control tower communications were strictly following a hundred times repeated routine exchanges. Employees at the airport were doing their work and subconsciously registering each take-off and landing even when it was not a part of their job descriptions. And everybody watching the blue and white Hungarian aircraft could see that the landing maneuver was not following the usual procedures.

The pilot must have his hands full, people on the ground and in the surrounding buildings were saying. The scenes that followed appeared to be cut out of a disaster movie. The airplane hit the runway hard with its front wheels. While the rear landing gear started smoldering, the left front tire split, the jet engine pitch rose, the aircraft made a sharp left turn off the runway, grass was flying through the air and then, with a crashing sound, the fuselage broke off just behind the wings.

The aircraft remained helplessly grounded next to the landing strip with 83 passengers and nine crew members on board, its front landing gear dug in one meter deep into the soft terrain. By that time the sound of sirens filled the air. Fire engines left their stations and rescue vehicles were called in immediately. This was the most critical moment of the rescue operation. Will the jet fuel ignite or not? The [aircraft] doors and emergency exits opened and, with trained hands, the crew dropped the emergency slides. The first passengers started to leave the aircraft. To the consternation of those who were watching, the rescued passengers began to light up their cigarettes. Once again, they were lucky. No jet fuel was leaking from the aircraft and so, even now, there was no fire. Two men in white freed the aircraft pilot Takac in the pilot compartment and provided first aid to the slightly injured passengers. In the Pod Petrinem hospital six ambulatory beds were standing by for the ambulance arrivals. However, they were not needed because only two passengers were brought here. An American and a Canadian with spine injuries. As we were informed just prior to press deadline by the resident physician Dr Pavel Balan, the men were not in shock and their injuries were slight. "Perhaps they did not even realize that they have really been born the second time." The aircraft captain Takac was hospitalized at the Motole university surgical clinic of Professor Nahodil. The injured [pilot] is out of danger.

The transportation minister of the CSSR, Vladimir Blazek, has appointed a commission of experts to investigate the air crash; Hungarian experts will participate in the investigation.

HEGEDUS AIRS VIEWS ON POLISH MILITARY TAKEOVER

Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 15 Dec 81 p 3

[Text] "The power takeover by the military is politically and sociologically understandable. It is too early to judge it from an ethical viewpoint." Such is the opinion of Andras Hegedus, Hungary's premier between 1955 - 1956. This man who called Soviet troops into Hungary in 1956 and who has been one of the most prolific critics of the Kadar regime since the 1960's now takes a stand midway between his two former positions in evaluating the Polish situation. Naturally, there is no approval, but neither is there a vehement emotional denunciation as was the case after the Warsaw Pact intervention in Czechoslovakia. At age 59, Hegedus, recipient of a pension resulting from a high communist award, is torn between a concept of absolute freedom and reality as its exists in East Europe.

"Without presuming to be capable of analyzing Jaruzelski's personality, I consider him representative of the rationale of the military decision maker who comprehends the true problems of Poland more clearly than an ideologist. He could find the right way between extreme conservatism and a high-handed exercise of power of the kind which toppled both Gomulka and Gierek. It would be the sort of power which could cooperate with the various autonomies which have arisen on a partnership basis." Hegedus fears nothing more greatly than civil war: "It now depends on both sides whether the process of democratization initiated in August 1980 can proceed."

According to Hegedus, "on the one hand the military leadership must have learned from past experiences which indicate that it is impossible to install a monolithic power structure permanently in Poland." It was issues of this sort that resulted in the overthrow of both Party chiefs up to 1980. "To repeat the mistake a third time would be too much." On the other hand, he warns that "the autonomous movements must learn that unless they seek unity, they will plunge Poland into civil war which will leave them no future. Aside from irrational heroism, they have nothing to offer from such behavior."

At the same time Hegedus speaks of a "magic formula" of communism, a third way which differs both from the path of government administration taken in the Soviet Union in 1917 and the self-management adopted in Yugoslavia in 1947. He sees the struggle between power and the masses which took place before Jaruzelski's coup as the beginning of a historical compromise which failed to become institutionalized but which, in his opinion, is necessary. "This compromise has not yet inevitably come to an end." The rapid dissolution of power over the past months have made the step of martial law a nearly logical necessity because of two simultaneous dangers, but it should be terminated after a period of consolidation. "One of the dangers consists of political factors: the compromise theory is inconceivable without power; it is based on a contract between two forces. Without power, there is anarchy."

According to Hegedus, the second danger is the following: Because of Poland's geopolitical position, the other Warsaw Pact members could not tolerate anarchy since this would threaten the entire balance of power in Europe. "Although the danger of civil war was and continues to be acknowledged, [without the takeover,] the threat of invasion for geopolitical reasons would have existed."

Leaving themselves no room for doubt, those who analyze Eastern power relations affirm the widely-held Western view that there has been no state power in Poland since August 1980. "This erroneous view has led to conclusions which disrupt the framework for possible compromise. Western views have strengthened the notion that compromise could provide only a temporary solution and could thus never evolve into a firm institutional form."

Hegedus, who prolonged his visit to Vienna by a day because of developments in Poland--his avidity for total information is constantly apparent--does not consider the power takeover a military coup in the classical sense. "In the first place, Jaruzelski was the elected head of the Party and, in the second place, this is not to be interpreted as a power takeover by the military but as the reinstatement of government control which would have been impossible through Party organizations. Of course, it would have been better if this step could have been avoided. I consider a rollback from military to civilian political power not only possible but necessary."

At this point the concept of ethics arose. "I will beware of judging the whole affair from a moral viewpoint, above all assuming the right to justify it. Ethical judgement depends on whether Poland can avoid civil war by having taken this step. Naturally, there is great danger that it can break out--possibly as a result of a general strike--before the government can begin to lay the groundwork for a compromise." Hegedus' criticism of Jaruzelski: "For this reason I would have held it necessary for the military authorities to state unequivocally their intention of restoring civilian political rule. Unfortunately, this did not happen."

MORAL AGREEMENT BETWEEN MARXISTS, CHRISTIANS POSSIBLE

Budapest MAGYAR NEMZET in Hungarian 27 Nov 81 p 7

[Article by Laszlo Makkai: "Dialogue of Marxists and Christians"]

[Text] On 25 September leaders and workers of the Philosophical Institute of the MTA [Hungarian Academy of Sciences], and of the philosophy faculties of the Lajos Kossuth Science University and the Debrecen Agricultural Sciences University held a symposium on religious theory as guests of the Academy Committee in Debrecen to which they invited several of the leading theologians of the domestic Protestant churches. The next day several of these same people participated in a dialogue between Protestant theologians and Marxist researchers on Protestantism.

The basic note of the symposium was sounded by an introductory lecture by Jozsef Lukacs analyzing the present relationship between Marxism and Christianity in that he set down the apparently parodoxical fact that while religion is one form of alienation, it is so under certain historical conditions and as such its current role can be part of the struggle against alienation. The socialist revolution and the struggle for the liberation of the colonial world made the Christian churches see that they should go back to their own progressive traditions but not in the traditional way, not striving for power positions but rather struggling with ideological weapons against the brutal manifestations of inhumanity. Christian humanity and Marxist humanism can unite in this struggle and they have frequently done so already.

One conditions for the search for new paths is that Marxist researchers on religion have a basic knowledge of contemporary Christianity, analyzing in a scientific way its developmental trends. The three chief reports at the sumposium examined the relationship between faith and knowledge, the concepts of man and personality and social policy ideals in contemporary Christian teachings. The speakers were aware of the different Christian denominations but the emphasis was on what is most important from the Hungarian viewpoint, Protestantism and Roman Catholocism. They spoke with recognition of the progressive motifs of the Second Vatican Council and the openness shown by it toward social justice, but still the opinion developed that "a progressive reception of social progress developed earlier and more markedly" in Protestantism, not least of all because Protestantism "shows a greater affinity for making use of the contemporary profane philosophical and ideological apparatus" (Jozsef Poor) or asserts that "a harmony between faith and knowledge cannot, but need not, be produced" (Gusztav Gecse).

Special attention was turned toward the so-called service theology of the domestic Protestant churches, which determinedly rejects methods aimed at ruling, regarding as its task charity and service to society in every good cause. This theology "does not alienate the believing strata of our population from their tasks in this world, does not turn them against their obligations in this world, but rather presents them as tasks and obligations following from their faith. This interpretation of man and personality approaches the individual in contact with his real social relationships and tries to arous in the believer a feeling of responsibility for the great, fateful questions of mankind" (Jozsef Poor). The social-policy teachings of this tehology correspond to this also, recognizing the justice of the socialist revolution and the moral higher order of socialism, as aspirations in accordance with the humanizing will of God serving historical truth, approving the limitation on the selfish aspects of private property, respecting work in that it enriches not only the individual but also the community and taking a stand against war and for peace. All this is a "qualitatively new social doctrine" which does not break with Calbin but rather modernizes and further develops his initiatives. Thus it can be said that "such a theological transformation has not taken place in the Protestant churches since the Reformation" (Istvan Konya). This theological self-realization is all the more significant because it was not simply forced by historical events, but has as its source a return to the Bible and a new interpretation of it.

Meeting with the new phenomena of religion also prompted the Marxist researchers on religion to inquire again of the sources, the classics of Marxism. For example, one of the reports at the symposium pointed out that Marx posted as a goal the transcending of both religion and philosophy in "positive humanism." Transcendence, aimed at transcending bare reality, is a property not only of religion but also of philosophy, including Marxist philosophy, but the latter realizes this goal via immanence, via real social existence, and not in an illusory fashion. At the same time, one can observe in contemporary religioup development also a rapprochement of transcendence and immanence. "Thus Marxism is not only the successor to and transcendence of philosophy, but also--in the final analysis--to and of the ideals of religion.... The cooperation of Christians and Marxists is not contingent and by chance...but rather it is a struggle against the world of alienation which necessarily goes in the same direction, although from different foundations and in different forms. Because the basic dividing line is not drawn between Christians and Marxists but rather between the Christians and the Marxists on one side and those on the other side who...reject every higher ideal in regard to the individual and historic prospects of human existence" (Ferenc Lendvai L.). In accordance with this is the recognition that "barren secularization and the increasing absence of religion in themselves can appear as victories only for an abstract atheism" because there has been no justification of the hope that "the victorious Marxist world view would take the place of the soil slipping out from under religious faith on a mass scale." There is no lack of evidence here that religion is being replaced by "world-view or ideological apathy, agnosticism, skepticism, the freezing of individual existence into barren particularity and anew alienation" (Istvan Jori).

The dialogue following the symposium started from the thesis that while both Marxism and Christianity must oppose nihilism, this obligation to cooperate cannot eclipse the fundamentalworld-view differences. "The limits of cooperation continue to be defined by our antagonistic world-view starting points," it was emphasized from the Marxist side (Istvan Konya), and this received a clear Christian answer: "At present, we see no possibility that Christian theology can take over dialectic historical materialism as a fundamental phiosophical view, or that Marxism can take over the starting point of Christian theology" (Elemer Kocsis). Under the present conditions of our thought apparatus and world-view positions the boundaries of atheism and of faith in Gof cannot be crossed over; the Marxists reject the idea of convergence just as the Christians reject the attempts of syncretism.

So the greatest difference is in the chief question, in the teachings concerning man. Atheism is "an essential motif of Marxism, because it recognizes no other author or player in history but man" (Jozsef Lukacs) while Christianity recognizes no other type of man than one who is "in the image of God, a being createdin the likeness of God" and as such "ordained to serve one another with love as communal beings, thus remaining, as it were, in communion with God also, creating, as it were, a second world with their work and abilities" (Elemer Kocsis).

But going beyond this obvious and actual opposition, there are also apparent contradictions between Marxism and Christianity deriving from differences of terminology which can be clarified and dispersed by mutual goodwill and devoted research.

In the final analysis, however, neither the apparent nor the real contradictions should hinder the moral understanding and cooperation of Marxists and Christians. "We may debate about what we regard as the source of moral values, about what we regard as the source of rules and norms, but certainly our views should not diverge in regard to the real demands, content and norms of morality...." Indeed, "it was not by chance that Marx made a distinction between atheism, as theoretical humanism, and practical humanism, communism.... Is communism, as practical humanism, unacceptable to a believing Christian? Obviously it is impossible to join up with theoretical humanism, with atheism," but the path toward practical humanism "is not closed." In other matters "we should leave the decision to history" (Jozsef Lukacs).

It was noted, as if in approval of this, that the theology of service, which in itself is not unique to Hungary, has a unique Hungarian aspect in that "service involves positive cooperation with Marxists and active participation in the building of our socialist society." This decision of the Protestant churches was born of faith and they assumed with this the risk of faith too, but this demands the recognition that "Christianity does not necessarily represent social backwardness even in socialism," and it is a condition for productive cooperation that "we be able to regard the religious person and the nonreligious person as of equal value without reservations from the theoretical viewpoint" (Karoly Prohle).

The answer to anxieties in this regard was given earlier and from a most worthy source. Jozsef Szigeti quoted in the dialogue the words of the historian Zsigmond Pal Pach: "We must see and appreciate the fact that religion transmits moral values and norms--according to its own use of concepts--between God and the believers, in other words between society and the individual; which is to say it prescribes moral rules for human conduct, for the behavior of individuals toward their fellows. Thus, a religious believer adhering to human-moral norms may come closer to us, may stand closer to us, the Marxists, than an atheist who is indifferent toward his fellows. We must see this and must respect religion as one possible branch of that complex system mediating the link between the individual and society, as one possible counterbalance to keep the natural individualism of man from becoming barren egoism, cold selfishness and alienation from the community. The other side of the coin, naturally, is that the churches, church personalities and representatives of church communities must see and bear witness to the fact that in contemporary Hungary active participation in the building of socialism is compatible with the religious life. If this insight is mutual, then Marxists and believers can and will really find one another in the national community of socialist Hungary" (TARSADALMI SZEMLE, No 5, 1981, pp 40-410.

The dialogue is continuing Bishop Dr Tibor Bartha has undertaken to be the host for the next round within the frameowrk of the College of Doctors of Theology, the scientific forum of the Reformed Church.

ENTRENCHED BUREAUCRATS SEEN THREATENING REFORM

Budapest MAGYAR HIRLAP in Hungarian 29 Nov 81 p 5

[Article by Andras Banki: "Bottleneck"]

[Text] The results of sociological studies prove that safety becomes an increasingly emphasized value in leadership style with advancing years--sticking to tested methods--whether they worked or not--and distrust of the new or different. It is also a statistical fact that about half of those in positions of power, those working in leadership categories in Hungary, were born in the 1920's, and so are now treading down their fifties. So the question arises whether the preponderance of this age group in the leadership is not an objective obstacle to the renewal aspirations germinating or already shooting up in our society.

I do not like honor laps and I did not take pen in hand to write about the historical merits or mistakes, luck or misfortune of those who are now in their fifties. We are well acquainted with the historical antecedants which raised this age group, the generation of "bright winds," very young, to leading offices at the end of the 1940's and the beginning of the 1950's. And we are well acquainted with those historical events in which this generation--because of their positions--played the chief role and acted as a driving force: The personality cult, the counterrevolution, the consolidation, the new economic mechanism and then its sudden halt and revival. So why do I refer to these processes? Because one can conclude from their contradictory tendencies that this generation does not have a uniform profile; there were and there are among them both progressive and retrograde forces.

I am 30 years old; but my faith and trust in the younger age groups does not derive from some sort of generational prejudice. I could have no cause for prejudice because even the younger--and really not so young--generations cannot be regarded as uniform. They also--like the older generation--are divided by an inclination to conservatism, dogmatism or apologetics or by receptivity to reforms, attraction to the new and different; they are divided by a compromising or uncompromising attitude, intellectual sluggishness or intellectual freshness, knowledge or ignorance and by much else besides. For my part, I side with unceasing renewal, progressive changes and changers and with all those who have similar values, intentions and aspirations, whether they be young or old. And if I place in the foreground the younger of them--those 20 or 30 or 40 years old--it is simply because the stakes are higher for them, objectively, since they have longer careers before them; they can win more or lose more and as a result they are more interestedin development, in the formation and transformation of reality.

But, it is the predecessors who decide with greatest weight in the selection of successors. In itself this would not be a problem; but it is dangerous in those organizations, those ossified hierarchies, in which the little chiefs serve the big chiefs and the big chiefs serve the bigger chiefs in an unprincipled way in which, in this way, subjective motives play the chief role. In such organizations--and unfortunately there are a good many of them--the predecessors have won their dubious merits in the noxious equalization of results, juggling them until they cannot be measured, in the ideologized elimination of the principle of utility and uselessness, in the corruption of the humane into the pseudohumane and one cannot expect them not to choose their successors from their own "camp." And it is true of these situations that frequently a really good leader is not the result of the selection mechanism but rather of the failure of the contraselection.

It is a crucial question of our social development today whether we can develop our institutional system and our institutional mechanisms so as to give greater scope to a "more socialist" development of our social and production relationships, whether we can progress further in the democratization of power and property in spite of a bureaucracy which reproduces itself. And this is an indispensable conditions if we are to make relationships lacking interest into relationships involving interest, give greater freedom to responsible management of property and the creative spirit, realize the performance principle, encourage undertakings and expand individual and collective freedom.

Let us not be idealists; what is involved here is a struggle. And we cannot expect from the bureaucracy--and the bureacrats in it--that, by their very nature, they will deign to seize the banner of reform. Despite this the situation is far from hopeless. And the less so, the stronger the political will urging the introduction and realization of the reforms and the stronger the mass base for the reforms.

And if we are talking about a struggle, then naturally, a key question is who those in leading posts are. It is urgent to think about this. In the present situation, requiring a difficult and swift development, can we permit ourselves leaders who are bound to the old habits by too strong ties dup to their positions and their political, ideological views? To me nothing is more obvious than that the reform policy and the realization to the reforms have personal consequences. An organized, strongly centralized guidance and redistribution based on the faith placed in the omnipotence of the state--it is true, not without necessity--required a different leadership style than the more independent management replacing it, one more strongly influenced by the market automatisms. And in this developing structure we no longer need leaders who reliably carry out higher directives, since the number of higher directives will probably greatly diminish. It follows that greater emphasis must be given in the work of leaders--and not only economic leaders--to such values as expertise, creativity, enterprising spirit and independent management. The more such leaders there are, the more quickly will the goals of the reform policy be realized; and the more consistent and the more daring policy is in working out and introducing reforms, the more this will favor the taking root of the new leadership style, the more it will favor the new type of leaders.

It is obvious that one cannot simply dismiss the wornout part of a generation, and even less can one expect them to dismiss themselves. But an acceleration of the change of generations is unavoidable in the interest of development; and this requires a more varied approach to the problem. The generations behind those in their fifties--those in their forties, thirties and twenties--have piled up on one another. They stand in the anteroom, waiting to be invited in. Who among them will be summoned? The question demands attention not without cause. Because the exchange of generations can be successful and can serve development only if it is accompanied by a change of values and by a new quality.

COMMANDER OUTLINES GOALS OF ARMY GENERAL STAFF ACADEMY

Warsaw ZOLNIERZ WOLNOSCI in Polish 17 Nov 81 p 4

[Article by Maj Gen Dr Jozef Kaminski, commander of the General Staff Academy of the Polish Army: "Training for the Future"]

> [Text] The community of the General Staff Academy of the Polish Army [ASG WP] has started a new academic year in optimistic anticipation of the further socialist development of the People's Republic of Poland and strengthening of its defense capability in permanent alliance with the states of socialist community. We are convinced that bringing the country out of the present deep crisis is possible primarily by way of enhancing authentic responsibility and joint responsibility for the increase in productivity and quality of the work carried out, for the fullest possible, rational utilization of the workday, and by way of strengthening personal discipline and social discipline, that of the collectives which we act within.

Coming out in favor of the constant and everyday implementation of the resolution of the Fourth Plenum of the PZRP by everybody in his position and in his field, we also require more of ourselves and plan for more ambitious goals in this academic year, both in the field of instruction and ideological indoctrination and that of scientific research. We view the extremely difficult situation in the country primarily from the standpoint of our defense capability and through the looking glass of the current and projected politicomilitary situation in Europe and the world, and also in the context of the discord between the detente and arms limitation trend represented by socialist countries and the course of threat and arms race pursued by imperialism.

Due to the role and importance of the ASG WP in our defense system we feel increasingly responsible for the situation and socialist development of People's Poland, for the continual consolidation and upgrading of the level of combat readiness of military commands, staffs and troops, and for the state and level of national defense.

Wholehearted adherence to ideology, high discipline, a feeling of responsibility and high skills of professional cadre, especially of the command and staff cadre, determine and posture of the armed forces, their everyday preparedness for the defense of the socialist motherland. The statement to this effect may, of course, be considered trivial. The ASG WP trains and indoctrinates exactly this kind of cadres-- future academy-graduate officers, who will, after their graduation from the academy, hold key positions in our armed forces and in the institutions associated with the sphere of defense.

In its 34 years of existence, the academy has undergone many changes.

However, it has always proceeded from the assumptions and implemented the policies laid down at the time the academy was founded. It has been incessantly improving the process of training and indoctrination and scientific-research activity, while simultaneously shaping high ideologicopolitical qualities, morale and discipline of its cadets. The academy has graduated thousands of officers who occupied and occupy today the highest posts in our armed forces. We take pride in the fact that the present first secretary of the PZPR, Army General Wojciech Jaruzelski is a graduate of our school.

In recent years, the years 1977 and 1980, the panel of the minister of defense has twice evaluated the activity of the ASG WP and offered general directions for its further improvement on the initiative of General Jaruzelski.

The directives adopted at the panel meetings have been consistently carried out, creatively developed and enriched by new contents ensuing from the requirements of the current situation. In the era of sweeping changes occuring in all spheres of political, social, economic and scientific life, in times of the scientific-technical revolution, in the environment of continually intensifying ideological struggle, we consider it indispensable to further improve instruction, ideological indoctrination and scientific-research activities in order to ensure the safeguarding and defense of historical accomplishments of the Polish people and the preservation of its independent existence. In particular, we stress combining of training and indoctrination and the shaping of the personality of the contemporary commander and staff officer.

It should be recalled that the current official documents describing the profile and structure of the ACS WP define the "academy-graduate officer" as an officer who has been comprehensively trained and prepared to carry out command and staff functions in tactical, operational and central echelons of command, both in times of war and peace. This, of course, is a very general statement, which I would like to explain and clarify below.

First--the "academy-graduate officer" is an officer who has been comprehensively trained and prepared to discharge various command/staff and control functions that require assuming responsibility (or joint responsibility) for the organization and coordination of actions.

Second--"the academy-graduate officer" is an officer possessing deep and comprehensive knowledge, theoretically and, which should be stressed, methodologically prepared to discharge (regardless of the echelon of command) all the control and staff functions that require creative tactico-operational thinking and the sense of responsibility and self-dependence in action. From the practical standpoint, he should be prepared to discharge the function of a coordinator for the actions of different combat arms and branches of the arms forces within the framework of respective echelons of command.

Third--"the academy-graduate officer" is an officer prepared for the discharging of control and staff functions mainly in time of war. The needs of war must be crucial to the direction, subject and scope of his training. However, he must also be prepared for action in time of peace, especially as far as the training of troops and staffs is concerned, that is, preparing them for action in time of war and maintaining continuous and high combat readiness.

Fourth--"the academy-graduate officer" is an officer with an exemplary ideologico-political and moral posture, social involvement and high discipline; he is a fervent patriot, and, at the same time, an internationalist.

Besdies, the academy-graduate officer should be distinguished by his ability for quick mental concentration under difficult and extremely complicated conditions, the logic of thinking and rational activity, industriousness and organizational resourcefulness. He should also be prepared, specifically in the ASG WP, to acquire knowledge independently and continuously and to spread this knowledge after the study has been completed.

Therefore, the academy-graduate officer should not only possess comprehensive, up-to-date and prospective knowledge, but also be able to think primarily in the categories of our state and its armed forces as well as the entire socialist community and its defense system. The officer should also acquire the skill to independently digest the new achievements resulting from the development of military technology and the art of war, especially in the art of operations of both friendly and aggressor forces.

The academy-graduate officer is a man of solid, substantial knowledge and practical skills, which are the foundation of mature and highly efficient organization and control of combat, battles and operations. He also possesses the methodological knowledge which facilitates solving on his own new problems in the art of war and, in general, those pertaining to the country's defense. The academy-graduate officer should be distinguished by initiative and self-dependence, sense of reality and inspiration. He should be a commander with comprehensive erudition and wide intellectual perspectives.

to meet these requirements which are only seemingly excessive, the academy-graduate officer must be a man of integrity, with stalwartness, modesty and an impeccable ideologicomoral posture as well as political and social involvement. This is why we shpae and foster in the course of our instruction and training process, from the very first year of studies, the mental proficiency and integrity of character of future academy-graduate officers. During the training course in the ASG WP we attach no less importance to the shaping of academy-graduate officer's personality than to his general and professional training.

We shape primarily the traits of the officer's character which will be indispensable for him in carrying out his everyday duties. We count among them strong willpower, decisiveness, composure, especially in complicated and conflict situations, ability to expend mental and physical effort over a long run, boldness in decisionmaking, persistence in action and absolute loyalty in carrying out binding decisions of superior officers. We strive to shape and develop tactico-operational imagination, the ability to project and predict the development of a situation, and, where necessary, to take calculated risks and assume responsibility for the outcome.

The academy-graduate officer must be courageous, must have an accordingly shaped character and be ready to defend his views even if they are unpopular at the moment and do not cause the proverbial smile of approval among superior officers.

I must stress that the shaping of positive character traits of the future academy-graduate officer is difficult and cannot be accomplished by classroom training alone. Hence, we attach immense importance to diligent and persistent work of each instructor with each cadet on a personal basis, to individual instruction from the first year of study on. This difficult task which we pose before our instructors engenders high responsibility and requires of them not only adequate training, but also authentic involvement and incessant striving for qualitative reevaluation of the effects obtained by their labor.

Because of this, we will require in the new academic year a further improvement of the ways and means of training and indoctrination, especially in target work, individual instruction activity which is skillfully directed. The goal which this activity consistently strives to attain is the comprehensive training of a clever academy-graduate officer, and, at the same time, a highly involved politicosocial activist. The academy-graduate officer must stand out as a superior-grade specialist, an organizer of contemporary and future battlefield situations, and of efficient and rational actions of large personnel teams, always under difficult, complicated and nonreproducible conditions and situations. Also, because of this, there must be an individual approach to each cadet of the ASG. His psychointellectual, moral and professional/personal traits must be understood in depth.

The individual aspect of learning is intimately intertwined with programmed training of the cadets. Professional training of the academy-graduate officers involves primarily a solid and comprehensive education in tactics and operations. Due to this, the art of war, and especially tactics and the art of operations are the superior integrating subjects which bind all the other subjpcts taught into a definitive hierarchical structure of the system of study in the ASG WP which is internally coherent.

By continually perfecting the traditional means and ways of education of the future academy-graduate officers, we strive for an opportunity for them to compare theory with practice in the study process. To ensure this, the cadets and also the school's faculty actively participate in the training exercises of military commands, headquarters and troops. For this purpose, we extensively use the training base of military units. We set up field camps in summer and winter, conduct command/staff exercises in the field employing technical means of control, organize military history field trips. We closely link the study in the field with history, the remote and the most modern, especially with the battles of the 1st and 2nd armies of the Polish Army and the operations of the Soviet Army.

The primary status of the tactico-operational training makes possible and guarantees an increasing amalgamation of the processes of instruction, ideological indoctrination and scientific research, which determine the everyday rhythm of the school's activity. The scientific-research activity constantly enlivens, enriches and increasingly markedly defines the quality content of the training of future academy-graduate officers. At present, no process of tactico-operational training at the required level could be carried out without these activities. Due to the inspirational role of the Army General Staff and close cooperation with the Main Board of Combat Training, the scientific-research activities serve to develop the theory of strategy, art of operations and tactics, being not only a training for highly skilled command and staff personnel, but also a meaningful contribution of the academy to the cause of strengthening the country's defense capability.

Training the personnel in the field of tactics and operations, we simultaneously try to foster among the future commanders, staff officers, commanders and officers of combat arms and branches of the armed forces and services high ideologicopolitical and moral qualities, based on deeply patriotic and internationalist values, on the conscious conviction that battle in defense of the socialist motherland is the superior responsibility of every officer.

Consciously and with high appreciation of the goals and tasks facing the ASG WP in the new academic year, we pose increasing demands in our activities, especially in instruction and indoctrination. We think that we not only have an opportunity, but all the prerequisites and conditions as well to realize our intentions. We are concentrating on solving the main tasksk on which success hinges; we use our time, the material base and our creative potential better and more efficiently. We require of the personnel of our school a high sense of responsibility and joint responsibility for the qualitative results of our work and everyday activities.

In connection with this, we attach tremendous, indeed, fundamental importance in this field to everyday party-political work, work with people and for people, to consolidation and bringing the collectives together in groups, panels, chairs, departments, and particular organization units. All our undertakings, organizational measures and executive actions are aimed at constantly improving the processes of instruction, ideological indoctrination and scientific research, at the comprehensive training of future academy-graduate officers, at carrying out difficult and extremely responsible tasks connected with command/staff activities in our armed forces.

SOLIDARITY POSITION ON SELF-GOVERNING SCHOOL DEBATED

Interview with KKP Presidium Member Waszkiewicz

Warsaw SZTANDAR MLODYCH in Polish 14 Oct 81 p 3

[Interview with Dr Jan Waszkiewicz, Member of the Presidium of the Independent Self-Governing Trade Union (NSZZ) Solidarity National Consultative Commission (KKP) by Krzysztof Maslon: "Vision of a Self-governing School"; date and place not given]

[Question] Between the first and second rounds of the NSZZ Solidarity Congress, the delegates deliberated in 13 problem groups, preparing the bases of a program to express the union attitude regarding the most essential questions of our social life. You presided over the deliberations of the problem group devoted to matters of education and culture. What activities does NSZZ Solidarity want to undertake for the good of Polish education?

[Answer] I should like to stress that we discussed education and culture together. We do not divide the program into two groups of questions and, considering that culture and education are the property of society as a whole, the property of the whole nation, we want, as a union, to lavish particular care on them.

[Question] Of what will this care consist?

[Answer] We must have a timeframe for our activities. The union program is intended for the next 2 years. We know very well what kind of years they will be. Given the deepening crisis and the problems connected with the introduction of economic reform, NSZZ Solidarity cannot easily be expected to advance the health of the schools in a thorough-going way, and yet we must lead our schools out of the abyss. That is our first task.

[Question] What do you mean by the term "cultural abyss"?

[Answer] Culture and education have been seen as nonproduction sectors of the national economy. Therefore, they have been treated with neglect for many years. Not only has very little money been set aside for them, but also, in every difficult situation, economies have been made at their expense. Thence have come grave deficiencies and poverty in education. There are, perhaps, still more serious signs of backwardness--poor administration of the school system or falseness in teaching methods and subject matter.

[Question] The schools are really in a difficult situation. Is there a chance to improve it? Can Union activities be of help to the schools?

[Answer] I think so. We shall strive for an authentic socialization of the educational system. We shall lend support to all attempts at decentralization of the educational system. The school is such a special place in which, if I may say so, there are many subjects in action. For there are teachers, and the employees in general, the youth, parents and, finally, educational authorities. Therefore, the slogan of self-government has very many multiple meanings. The form of a school should probably be decided by the local community. Note that fruitful results never come about when activities are carried on in opposition to the environment. So I think the future of the schools lies in the direction of their interaction with the local community and the local self-governing body.

[Question] This can lead to a situation where there are as varied schools as there are local self-governing bodies. A resident of a city or a village has a different view of the school. There will be varied demands, varied levels.

[Answer] We are aware of that. There will be inequalities. But don't they exist now? They do. And how! And, after all, when the local community really commits itself to the cause of its school, it won't be a bad school, for no one, after all, wants to do his own children any harm.

[Question] Varied schools, therefore varied programs, varied courses...

[Answer] Of course. The only common thing should be a certain program core. The rest should correspond to the needs of the community. Take religion-connected matters, for one. Atheistic upbringing--and I stress atheistic as opposed to secular--in a religious environment has lamentable effects. A child is brought up, formed, above all, by his family, his surroundings. You can't suddenly demolish his defined world order. When he grows up, he will choose his own truth. A child's head cannot really be a battleground for two opposed points of view of so weighty a variety. It's not the proper place for an ideological battlefield.

[Question] In the recommendations made by the problem group, I found a statement referring to changes in the school system. What are we to understand by this?

[Answer] The principal change is that to be effected by the activity of self-governing bodies within the school bounds. The role of the school administration will be limited, and it will finally begin to exercise a service function in the teaching process. I also think that we will stop seeing the influx into the school system of people who have not proven themselves in another line of work. The self-governing body will assure most control functions over the school. When people come to understand that the makeup of the school really depends on them, the work of many inspectors will become unnecessary. And this will be true for other areas of the system as well. What, e.g., will the inspector have to do in the preschool?

[Question] Here I come to the defense of educational inspectors. In the end, if a preschool superintendent steals, such an inspector can be dismissed.

[Answer] Let's not kid ourselves. No one is more concerned about children's interests than their parents. If they find out that such a person is stealing, they will throw her out. But now appeals are made to the PIH [State Trade Inspectorate], the NIK [Supreme Chamber of Control] and educational authorities, and often the matter drags on without results.

[Question] Do you, then, see the self-government as the future of education?

[Answer] Not exclusively. We must look for new educational solutions, such solutions as schools for writers, working according to their own programs. Let us only hope--and we place enormous emphasis on this--that the truth be taught in our schools. This demand extends to all of the teaching program, and especially history, the Polish language and civic upbringing. We should not set their heads spinning over such a fundamental matter as the history of our own people. And returning to systems questions: schools should be established by various associations, institutions...

[Question] Such as the PAX schools?

[Answer] Yes, except that until now there have been few such schools: there are several run by religious orders, and there is PAX. To take this further--there is an obstacle created to the establishment of good private schools when the entire material responsibility falls on the persons running the schools. The history of our educational system owes much to such schools.

[Question] But...

[Answer] Let me forestall the question or, rather, the reproach of elitism. Of course, such a school must cost a good deal, but it would serve as the basis of a whole developed stipend system which must be created--a system in which the union would take part--to diminish the material barrier.

[Question] But what will happen when such a school falls into the hands of someone who is unsuited?

[Answer] And how many such persons have made their way into education until now? Let us not fear too greatly. Today's school is not the school described by Dickens. We are not living in the 19th century. Poland is not a society of illterates. People have a very good sense of where work stops and shoddiness begins.

[Question] You cannot deny, however, that such shoddiness can occur.

[Answer] No, I cannot. But if mistakes are made, there will be considerably fewer victims of these mistakes than formerly, when the schools deserted whole generations of people whose education was injurious in many ways, leaving them crippled. Moreover, the self-governing body, to which I return again and again, ought to stand as an added security against perversions and excesses.

[Question] You have so much to say about the self-governing body. Do you likewise look to student self-governing movements?

[Answer] Of course, we are counting on student self-government, on the young people's familiarity with their own terrain, conditions, for taking action, potentials and needs. Ultimately, without the participation of those who are directly interested, we cannot embark upon our work.

[Question] Several of the concepts which you have outlined are very far-reaching. Meanwhile, the everyday school reality with which we have to deal is a far cry from that reality of which we would dream. In addition, the school is a specific working ground. Many teachers do not belong to NSZZ Solidarity; many will not wish to accept this program, for various reasons. Will the union program not hang in a void, or will it not merely cause friction in teacher's groups?

[Answer] Our program represents a vision for the future; it designates the direction to be taken. Thus, we do not define any target point. However, I believe that our demands are just and will be accepted. Of course, we are counting on difficulties and the resistance of a part of the community, even the resistance of parents and students themselves. What is to be said of the role of the local self-governing body in the school when, e.g., in a given locality, parents do not wish to meddle in the school's affairs, or they remain indifferent?

We wish to give a chance to those who really desire a better school for all of us. And there are many such people. To use a term which has become fashionable of late, let me say that I believe in the network of people of goodwill. And besides, we will not undertake spontaneous, radical activities. We must set up new schools rather than liquidating bad ones; we must attract good teachers into the profession, rather than dismissing poor teachers from their jobs.

[Question] We have finally come, then, to the constructive program. May I ask you once again to introduce yourself to our readers. What is your connection with education?

[Answer] I am 37 years old. By virtue of my education I am a mathematician. Before going into union work, I was a futurologist working in the Wroclaw Technical University Center for Prognostic Research. I have also worked in various other fields of learning: philosophy, sociology and the theory and practice of teaching. For 4 years I taught mathematics in a Gottwald-type school having a mathematics profile. I likewise lectured at the Technical University. I also had a certain theoretical input into the formulation of the ideas of the Wroclaw School of the Future. And very recently I participated as a union expert in the talks conducted by NSZZ Solidarity with the Ministry of Education and Upbringing.

Rebuttal of Waszkiewicz's Position

Warsaw SZTANDAR MLODYCH in Polish 21 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Jerzy Gdoula]

[Text] One week ago in this column we published the text of an interview with Dr Jan Waszkiewicz, Presidium member of the National Commission of the Independent Self-governing Trade Union (NSZZ) Solidarity. In that interview, entitled "A Vision of the Self-governing School," Dr Waszkiewicz outlined the major directions which, in the opinion of an active member of the largest trade union in the country, our schools should take.

Krzysztof Maslon, who conducted the interview during the course of the NSZZ Solidarity Congress, essentially abandoned the idea of polemicizing with the views of his interviewee. He expressed a series of his own doubts and reservations, but did not polemicize, since this would have made the interview, an already lengthy text, considerably longer. It was rather a question of presenting our readers with the thoughts of NSZZ Solidarity operatives on general questions in the field of education.

In no way, however, does this mean that we concur with all the views of J. Waszkiewicz. Let us forego quoting such statements as "falseness in teaching contents and methods," and let us not question whether, in fact, it is possible to speak of falseness in teaching methods. We are ultimately dealing with an interview, and not with a scholarly or journalistic text.

Let us concern ourselves with J. Waszkiewicz's basic assumption. This assumption, i.e., the socialization of the school, is evident in the title of the interview. Am I opposed to the socialization of schools? Absolutely not. Frankly, it is my ideal for the education of the future. The problem lies in the fact that I understand school socialization differently than J. Waszkiewicz.

In the opinion of J. Waszkiewicz, the effect of local socialization upon the school should be decisive. It is enough merely to establish a "certain" program core, and the remaining contents of the teaching program should correspond to the needs of the community. This "remainder" may even be questions of a religious nature. Thus, Waszkiewicz's concept includes the possibility of negating the principle of school secularism. This is a marginal point; this is a question for us to return to at another time.

The concept of school socialization introduced by J. Waszkiewicz completely bypasses the question of state educational policy, when this policy was created to represent the interests of society. Agreed, educational policy, both past and present, has been subject to severe criticism. Such criticism suggests to me that educational policy must undergo very radical changes. However, I cannot agree with the thesis that because this policy is not perfect, it should be abandoned.

We cannot relieve the state of its duty to guarantee schools suitable material conditions, or its responsibility to create teaching programs which correspond to the contemporary levels of knowledge and of the development of civilization. Will the time come when the state will discharge this duty and fulfill this responsibility with excellence?

I do not believe that it will. The material needs of education will always be greater than the potential to meet them. Nor is it possible to create teaching programs which are thought by all to be contemporary, free of basic shortcomings, not too difficult and, hence, ensuring children a better education than that gained by their parents.

Then why do we need an educational policy? The answer is simple. The state alone is in a position to deal in a just manner with the material needs of all schools and, to the extent that it is possible, to eliminate the differences in conditions in schools. Local self-governing bodies, which have varying potential and varying hierarchies of values, are not able to do this.

In the question of programs, a similar situation exists. Programming the contents of education is a highly specialized activity requiring the involvement of specialists in fields which are widely divergent. At the same time, this programming must have a permanent character. It is naive to think that the local community will fulfill all of the conditions indispensable to the creation of a teaching program. This is simply the acceptance of the assumption that it takes no knowledge whatsoever to make a modern school. Education still amounts to economics and medicine, in which everyone is an expert...

A state educational policy, precisely in the sphere of educational programs, is the only basic determinant of the operational level of the school system. Teachers, students and parents alike must be aware of this level. It is the teaching program which is the objective arbiter for settling the numerous conflicts which arise among these three groups.

School socialization may not consist of the local community's determining the make-up of the school. This is an illusion. School socialization is based on the fact that local communities control and evaluate the operation of schools, using the state educational policy as the point of reference. There must be, of course, some sort of unequivocal criterion: feelings and the pretense of knowledge are not enough.

My vision of school socialization, which appears to be a very modest vision, is unfortunately very difficult to implement. The interest of the local communities or, in effect, of parents in the operation of schools is very superficial. It will be many years before the school becomes a "big deal" for local communities. The brutal truth is that until then parent-teacher meetings are all that is important for most parents.

My vision of school socialization does not lend itself to be ordained by decree. It is the end of a long process which will occur very differently in various communities. The vision of J. Waszkiewicz may be implemented immediately. The proper decisions are made and at once we have the correct educational mosaic. The material conditions of particular schools depend on the potential of local communities, meaning that the disparity between the rural school and the city school is increased. The teaching contents of elementary schools, depending on one's ambition, may boil down to learning reading and writing or it may practically turn it into a university. And so on and so forth.

Is this the question? For me--no. The outcome of J. Waszkiewicz's vision of the self-governing school is obviously the notion of the establishment of schools by various sorts of associations, institutions and even private persons. The history of our educational system owes much to private schools, it is true, but what was good historically may be disastrous today.

Until now, says J. Waszkiewicz, the schools have deserted whole generations of people whose education was injurious in many ways, leaving them crippled. I will ignore the absurdity of this appraisal which leads to the notion that in effect the whole of Polish society is made up of generations of cripples. I would only like to ask what sort of generations will be those generations which come from schools operating under the signboard of various political parties, trade unions religious associations and the like.

Under the signboard--obviously this is a mental capsulization. In the understanding of J. Waszkiewicz, the signboard entails determining the contents of education, which simply means indoctrinating young people in a spirit useful to the given organization. I think that young people should come away from the schools with the honest, documented knowledge that they live in a socialist state in which various political forces exist and in which the theoretical principles of socialism are often divergent from social practice.

Generally speaking, is this not the truth about our contemporary Polish society? Of course it is. And this truth should be present in the life of the school. School knowledge, although insufficient for one's whole life, nonetheless has a universal character. It must be certain, verified knowledge. It is, after all, the capital with which one enters life.

For this reason the current political quarrels, although they cannot but reach the schools, may not determine their operation. The school does not train the participants of today's quarrels, but prepares students to solve problems about which no one today has any conception. The school, while not avoiding the observation of current events and processes, must remain its own oasis of calm. This is really very important.

In opposition to J. Waszkiewicz, I would like my children to learn in a Polish school which, keeping pace with the realities, operates in a socialist country. All other epithets--party, solidarity's, branch or church--are truly unnecessary both for the school and for the children studying in the school.

Background of Controversy

Warsaw TRYBUNA LUDU in Polish 26 Oct 81 p 4

[Article by Jerzy Krasniewski: "On the Eve of the Sejm's Session on Education: Disputes About the Teachers' Charter"; passages enclosed in slantlines printed in boldface]

> [Text] /It is in the public interest for the teaching profession to have an advantageous status compared to other categories of workers. Since no one is questioning the old opinion of Stanislaw Staszic [a Polish Enlightenment figure] that the state of the Polish commonwealth and its prospects depend to a sizable degree on the level of education, the teaching profession should attract the most valuable human beings, those who are well-educated and prompted by motives which precondition educational accomplishments./

A properly drafted decree--the Teachers' Charter--could provide encouraging premises for such a status. But the bill voted by the Sejm in 1972 had not filled the need, as evidenced by practice.

The work on the new version of the charter is proceeding along two tracks ever since October last year. This work was initiated by the Ministry of Education and, much earlier, the Polish Teachers' Union [ZNP]. Soon the Teachers' Solidarity joined in this work. /As early as last May an acute impasse had appeared. Mediation even had to be undertaken by the Sejm Commission on Education and Upbringing, because Solidarity activists had questioned the very need of voting on the charter, regarding it as a harmful manifestation of special privileges for an occupational category./ But even before those concerned had the time to react, during about the same period Solidarity began a major campaign in favor of the Dockworkers' Charter and crowned it with success. In such a situation the arguments against the Teachers' Charter lost their force, but time was lost.

Without going into details it should be said that after 16 July, when the draft of the decree had, after numerous consultations, reached the government, the path of the charter continued to be difficult. It was only on 8 October, after a strike alert had been declared by teachers in several voivodships one day before the extraordinary plenary session of the Governing Board of the ZNP, convened to speed up the progress on this issue, that this important document was transmitted to the Sejm.

Elevating the Rank of the Profession

Of course, the government had its own arguments of a legislative nature, but the facts are in favor of the opinions of ZNP activists. They believe that, in addition to the valid difficulties, there also has been resistance and subjective obstacles by the institutions taking part in the preparatory work. All this has contributed to the tension, so much that there has arisen the threat of the application of the most radical forms of trade union protest.

/Why has the new version of the charter become so important to thousands of educators? Chiefly because this document appears to presage consistent and monitored improvements in the lot of teachers. At the last congress of the ZNP, as well as during its extraordinary plenary session, it was repeatedly stated that the teaching community was fed up with its status of economic pariahs. The documents of the Ninth PZPR Congress also presaged an end to that status./ Thus, if it is expected that the salaries of teachers should be raised to the level of the average wages paid to engineer and technician personnel in industry, and that this should be assured by a legislated machinery for the corresponding mandatory comparison and adjustment of these salaries, teachers want to have this in black and white.

This is to be accompanied by salary raises once every 2 years, a seniority pay allowance, allowances for work under difficult and unsalubrious conditions, decent overtime pay rates and remuneration for various extracurricular work. If, at the same time, the mandatory number of hours worked weekly does not deviate from the European average, and the salaries paid are supplemented with anniversary bonuses, the school bonus fund, and a fully paid 8-week annual vacation, and if moreover teachers receive an extra 15-percent increase in old-age pensions and annuities regardless of any merit increases they may be awarded, /then the teaching profession will ultimately become economically attractive/.

The efforts invested by the state and society in this better status will certainly after some time produce results by halting the current efflux of particularly valuable individuals from the teaching profession and thus at the same time will make possible a marked tightening of requirements for entering this profession. Until now accusations about the poor quality of performance of teachers have often been countered by ripostes about their low material status.

/It may be that the aforementioned premises of the charter will upset quite a few of our readers./ Even now, before any progress has been made in the negotiations about this document, people are talking about the prospects for a rosy life by teachers. The experience of many generations shows that an even more sizable increase in the wages of teachers would halt the efflux of mainly people genuinely interested in children and youth from preschools and schools.

/A teacher's work does not end when the clock strikes 3 or 4 pm. The average work week of a Polish language or literature teacher lasts 50 to 60 hours depending on the class. Other humanities teachers work just as long, not to mention the teachers of the exact sciences.

/For now the Sejm is in charge of the charter draft, but much still remains to be done./ Various ministries have submitted proposals or reservations concerning the draft of the bill. For example, the Administration Ministry demands that the charter include vocational instructors in industry, although those people are not educators and lack certified teaching skills. That ministry also denied teachers the right to extra living space although it is known that they have to do at home so much homework planning and assignments. The Labor and Wages Ministry believes that pension and annuity provisions should be deleted from the charter and that the provisions of 1972 should remain effective. But teachers would like to have all the rights that they had won contained in a single document, as they fear that the announced general decree for all [occupational categories] could cause them irreparable damage.

Proposals and Reservations

The Sejm has received, along with the draft of the bill, an ensemble of conflicting opinions from the trade unions. /Teachers' Solidarity still questions the term "charter," believing that this should be a bill about the legal status of teachers./

That union also is of the opinion that the document should be of an interim nature until the Sejm votes upon a decree on the national education system. The ZNP suggests that the bill should be adopted with the reservation that later, after suitable adaptation, the charter would become a component part of a general bill on the nation's educational system. The state authorities respond that such proposals not only run counter to the principles of legislative procedure but also represent an attempt to restrict the freedom and independence of the Sejm. It is not possible at present to prejudice the Diet's opinion as to the structure and name as a component part of a decree which will be voted upon several years hence.

/Teachers' Solidarity further proposes that the phraseology in one of the paragraphs, "...upbringing in the spirit of socialist principles," be replaced with the more general "upbringing in the spirit of humanist principles."/ It also suggests deletion of references to discipline of labor and the duty of objective evaluation of students. In the opinion of Solidarity, the bill should contain the statement that recommendations by educational authorities should be implemented only if a teacher considers them as not conflicting with the law and his personal conscience. Another proposal deals with the wording of that part of the preamble which concerns the evaluation of a teacher's performance.

/In the opinion of the state authorities, certain of these proposals are of a restrictive nature. It is self-evident that educational authorities must follow the provisions of the law, while as for the term "conscience," that is too broad and subject to various interpretations. It is difficult to imagine education and upbringing unless the teacher maintains discipline and is objective in evaluating students. The proposal concerning the interpretation of recommendations from the authorities might lead to the questioning of any such recommendation, which would disorganize work at schools./ Not to mention that the deletion of the provision concerning the right to evaluate a teacher's performance would make teachers the only occupational category to be outside the provisions of the Labor Law Code, which specifies the duty of evaluating workers. Besides, this right is universal.

Calm Is Needed

I mentioned only a few questions, but the controversy has also broadened to include salaries and forms of employment relationship. The ZNP demands that the bill include a provision specifying the schedule for the issuance of implementing regulations. Some of such regulations ensuing from the preceding bill have not yet been issued.

/But the subject of the sharpest dispute and of mass protests by the ZNP membership is the government's proposal for extending to 4 or 5 years the 3-year deadline for implementing the rights granted in the charter./ The union members claim that this proposal conflicts with the resolution of the Ninth PZPR Congress which postulates a 3-year period of the implementation of improvements in the material conditions of teachers, as does the resolution of the 32d ZNP Congress.

/Finally, the financial effects should also be mentioned. The implementation of the charter will require spending an additional 31.5 billion zlotys, of which nearly 27 billion would be for salaries. Personnel effects also have been calculated. The demographic peak and reduction in homework load will require employing about 160,000 teachers by 1990./

All these matters are at present extremely difficult to resolve. The consultations initiated 15 October by the Sejm Commission for Education and Upbringing should be accompanied by calm if this work is to produce the expected results. Much indicates that some compromises will prove necessary.

/One should feel convinced that soon now the Sejm will adopt a decision that will satisfy the teaching community. At the same time, it must be stated with equal conviction that until then teachers arm themselves with patience, without depriving pupils of their care./

Differences Between Government, ZNP

Warsaw GLOS NAUCZYCIELSKI in Polish 25 Oct 81 p 3

[Text of Comments by the ZNP [Polish Teachers Union] Secretariat: "Teachers' Charter: Yes and No"; passages enclosed in slantlines printed in boldface]

[Text] /The teaching community is greatly disturbed by the revisions that have been introduced in the draft of the Teachers' Charter transmitted to the Sejm. What are these revisions? The Secretariat of the ZNP Government Board has performed a detailed analysis of the document to identify the postulates of the ZNP that it takes into account and the divergences between the government's position and the expectations of the teaching community. Below we publish the text of the comments prepared by the ZNP Secretariat.

On 8 October 1981 Premier Wojciech Jaruzelski transmitted to the Sejm the draft of the new Teachers' Charter.

/I. This draft takes into account certain fundamental postulates contained in the ZNP's concept of the updating of the charter, which markedly contributes to improving the socioeconomic status of teachers, in particular:/

1. The introduction of two forms of formalization of the employment relationship, namely, by appointment [tenure] and by employment contract, which includes the specified obligation of the school authorities to tenure a teacher after 3 years of work. The practice of appointment for a definite period, until recall, and of recommendation contracts has been dropped.

2. A marked restriction of the practice of arbitrary transfer of teachers from one post to another (without their consent) in the event of organizational changes.

3. The establishment of a comparable--to that of the occupational group of engineers and technicians employed in industry--salary level (Article 30).

4. The introduction of the principle that teachers receive salary increases once every 2 years throughout 30 years of teaching work (Article 30).

5. Granting teachers the right to:

--seniority pay allowance (Article 32);

--anniversary bonuses (Article 48);

--institutional bonus fund, the so-called "13" [bonus equal to 1 month's pay] (Article 49).

6. More advantageous rules for overtime pay. Among other things, overtime pay levels will be graduated according to rank, and vacation pay will be adjusted in full to average pay (Articles 34 and 67).

7. Further reduction--compared with the state as of 1 September 1981--in the number of weekly hours of teaching and upbringing activities (Article 42).

8. A marked restriction of employers' rights as regards burdening teachers with unpaid teaching and upbringing activities (Article 42).

9. A marked restriction of the possibilities for burdening teachers with overtime work without their consent (Article 34).

10. The provision of possibilities for graduated professional advancement as a form of promotion in rank (Article 46).

11. Obligating the employer to provide teachers in schools with the basic conditions for the accomplishment of pedagogical and upbringing tasks (Article 28).

12. Statutory granting of rights to the teachers' council to codecide on the staffing of managerial positions in schools (Article 16) and as regards the assignment of additional pedagogical-upbringing duties to teachers (Article 42).

13. Assuring the implementation of the right to free housing for all teachers employed in rural areas and in towns with up to 2,000 inhabitants or--in deficit [shortage] areas--up to 5,000 inhabitants (Article 54).

14. Introduction of a permanent pay allowance for teachers working in rural areas and in towns with a population of up to 2,000, or, in deficit [shortage] areas, up to 5,000 inhabitants.

15. Exempting teachers from rent increases for occupancy of additional dwelling space in the form of an additional room (Article 57).

16. Extending vacation leave to 8 weeks, especially for teachers in places without summer vacations (Articles 64 and 66).

17. An unambiguous rule that a teacher who works until the last day of school and then resigns has the right to [paid] vacation leave (Article 65). Previously that right was lacking.

18. The introduction of so-called nonservice status in the event that employment is not available for a teacher relocating to the permanent residence address of his or her spouse (Article 70).

19. Granting to teachers the right to old-age pension after 30 years of work, including 25 years of employment in category 1, (Article 87).

20. Broadening the basis for the determination of old-age pension by including bonuses for professional accomplishments (Article 87) and by granting a 15-percent extra allowance for old-age pension or annuity in lieu of the previous 10 percent (Article 88)--the ZNP is proposing 20 percent.

21. Granting to pensioners and annuitants the right to benefit from the health fund (Article 72).

22. Introduction of the possibility of appealing to organs independent of the educational authorities in the event of disputes ensuing from the employment relationship. Adoption in this respect of the regulations of the Labor Law Code (Article 93).

In addition, provisions of the previous charter which glaringly violated the principles of social justice have been voided. This concerns, e.g.:

--Article 96 which allows the dissolution of employment relationship with a tenured teacher without any disciplinary proceedings and solely upon consent of the minister;

--Article 32 which imposes the duty of substituting for other teachers, as the need arises, to the extent of 2 hours weekly, without extra remuneration.

/11. Independently of the aforementioned positive changes in the draft of the charter, it is necessary to identify the government's positions which diverge from the expectations of the teaching community and do not fully allow for the ZNP's position.

/One major difference between the government's draft of the Teachers' Charter and the ZNP is the schedule for implementing the provisions of the charter, which the government wants to stretch over the period until 1985 whereas the ZNP wants a 3-year period of implementation, i.e., ending in 1983 (the same position has been taken in the resolution of the Ninth Extraordinary Congress of the PZPR).

/Moreover:/

1. The provisions of the charter do not apply to teachers employed in posts requiring certified teaching skills at:

--central organs of state administration;

--trade union elements associating teachers.

2. The evaluation of a teacher's performance is given a prominent place in the charter although it ensues from general legal provisions and there was no need to define it in such categorical terms (Article 5).

3. There is no provision that a teacher is legally entitled to tenure if he satisfies specific requirements but has not been evaluated after 3 years (Article 10).

4. The position of the "gmina-town director of schools" has been retained instead of the proposed "inspector of education and upbringing," which entails vacation privileges and a double legal status (Article 16).

5. A provision allowing the discharge of a teacher from a managerial function in school following a 3-month notice has been introduced, but this should be allowed only in especially justified instances (Article 16).

6. The provision allowing the transfer or relocation of a teacher from one post to another without his or her consent has been retained (Article 17).

7. The adopted principle is that the average salary of a teacher /should not be/ lower than that of an engineer or technician in industry, instead of /may not be lower/ (Article 30).

8. The provision for annual adjustment of teachers' salaries in view of the rising cost of living has been deleted.

9. The definition of overtime hours includes the term "worked" instead of "assigned," which greatly affects the interpretation of payment for overtime hours (Article 34).

10. The remuneration for overtime hours during periods of justified absence has been limited to 1 week (Article 34).

11. The newly introduced provision that during a vacation leave the salary paid should be the average of the preceding 3 months instead of 10 months, except in cases where the salary fluctuates markedly so that an average of 12 preceding months has to be calculated (Article 67).

12. The table of working posts and of the weekly number of hours of teaching activities:

--differentiates between the number of hours for teachers in school libraries and in libraries of teaching materials;

--retains the differentiation in numbers of hours for school teachers and teachers employed in educational-professional counseling clinics;

--has not reduced the number of hours for Polish-language teachers, training-school teachers, special-school teachers, and others.

13. The provision of the previous charter awarding the Gold Cross of Merit to teachers for 20 years of /"irreproachable"/ teaching activity has been retained (Article 52).

14. There is introduced the provision that, following 30 years of distinguished professional activity the organ representing a teacher /submits/ a proposal for awarding the Order of Polonia Restituta [Rebirth of Poland] instead of that "the Order of Polonia Restituta is /awarded/" (Article 52).

15. The provision concerning the social and housing fund for teachers, pensioners and annuitants, and the crediting of such funds to pensioners and annuitants as well, has been completely deleted (Section 7).

16. The right to free housing and rural extra-pay allowance has not been extended to all teachers working in towns with a population of up to 5,000, and instead it has been restricted in such cases only to teachers working in areas defined as deficit [shortage] (Article 54).

17. The right to free housing has not been extended to pensioners or annuitants who started to receive their pension or annuity prior to 1972 (Section 7).

18. The right to a household allowance has not been granted to all teachers who undertake work directly after completing their studies (Article 61).

19. No allowance has been made for discounts for travel via PKS [State Motor Transport], with only discounts for travel via PKP [Polish State Railroads] being granted (Article 62).

20. The principle that a school director may obligate a teacher to perform activities relating to the conduct of tests and work connected with the commencement or ending of a school year for as many as 15 days during the school vacation period has been retained. (Article 64).

21. A provision obligating the concerned ministries to determine the actual list of occupational diseases has been omitted (Article 72).

22. The provision that Teacher's Day is a day of leisure has been deleted (Article 74).

23. The provision concerning the possibility of special investigations in disciplinary proceedings against teachers has been omitted (Section 10).

24. There is no provision that payments in kind are subject to inclusion in pension and annuity payments (inclusion in Article 87).

25. There is no provision that the extra allowance for teaching work is also payable in addition to disability pensions granted in cases of work accidents and occupational diseases (Article 88).

26. No allowance has been made for a provision awarding pensioned teachers an extra 25 percent allowance for clandestine teaching (Section 11).

27. There are no provisions specifying a regular updating of the level of pensions and annuities (Section 11).

28. A provision concerning the cooperation between the organizational units of educational administration and the trade unions of teachers has been omitted.

29. A provision placing the proper organs of state administration under the obligation of issuing implementing regulations with respect to the charter within a closely defined schedule has been struck out (Section 12).

Explanation of Sejm Commission Chairman

Warsaw GLOS NAUCZYCIELSKI in Polish 25 Oct 81 pp 1,2,3

[Article by Prof Dr Habilitatus Jarema Maciszewski, chairman of the Sejm Commission for Education and Upbringing: "For the Common Good"; passages enclosed in slantlines printed in boldface]

> [Text] On 15 October this year, there was a session of the Sejm Commission for Education and Upbringing, chaired by Prof Dr Habilitatus Jarema Maciszewski.
>
> The most important item on the agenda was exchange of opinions among the deputies concerning further work on the updated Teachers' Charter transmitted by the government to the office of the Sejm Marshal [speaker].
> In view of the fact that the further fate of the charter is of focal concern to all teachers, we turned to the chairman of the Sejm Commission for Education and Upbringing for an explanation of the detailed course of further work by the Sejm on the draft of the new Teachers' Charter.

In recent years the Sejm has received hundreds of telegrams, letters, and resolutions from teachers' councils, elements of the Polish Teachers Union [ZNP], groups of teachers, and also--although in a small number--teacher commissions of the Independent Self-governing Trade Unions (NSZZ) Solidarity. A common tenor of most of these missives has been the protest against what their authors consider the slow progress of the work on the new Teachers' Charter, and against the changes which the government has introduced into the draft of that charter, as well as the unanimously expressed support for the resolutions of the National ZNP Congress and the extraordinary plenary session of the Governing Board of NZP-Education. Nearly all the mail has been addressed either to the Sejm Commission for Education and Upbringing or to me personally.

I am unable to reply promptly to every letter and telegram and hence I avail myself of the kindness of the editors of GLOS NAUCZYCIELSKI to reply on its pages as soon as possible to all colleagues.

We all place great hopes in the new legal settlement of the teacher's status. Our hopes pertain to both the living and social conditions of the teacher community and the working conditions of the school and the teacher, which have always been very difficult and complicated and which at present during the period of the all-encompassing economic and sociopolitical crisis, endanger the normal functioning of schools, preschools, and educational-upbringing outposts. The new regulation of the legal status of the teacher is associated with the need--ripening over a number of years--to acknowledge not so much in word as in deed the high rank of our profession, its role and place in the nation's life.

Acting on this conviction, the Sejm Commission for Education and Upbringing has been exerting every effort to speed up the work on the draft of this bill and acting as a mediator in the difficult process of smoothing out the differences among the Ministry of Education and Upbringing, the ZNP, and NSZZ Solidarity. These differences in opinion, which emerged during joint discussions of individual articles of the charter, as well as of the nature of this bill as a whole, have been a major reason why the transmittal of the charter to the Council of Ministers has been delayed.

More detailed information on this topic has already been published in GLOS NAUCZYCIELSKI, so I will not repeat it. The present situation is as follows:

/On 8 October this year, the government draft of the "Teachers' Charter" has been transmitted to the office of the Sejm Marshal. Its general tenor as well as its specific provisions are quite favorable to teachers and are generally in agreement with the opinions and postulates of teachers as well as the content of the social agreements concluded last year with the trade unions dealing with education and upbringing. As for those provisions in the draft of the charter which arouse or may arouse dissatisfaction, doubts, or a feeling that valid claims by teachers have not been accorded sufficient justice, these may be revised and corrected in the course of the legislative work of the Sejm. I cannot, of course, predict the final decisions of the Commission for Education and Upbringing and of the Sejm as a whole. I can only express here my deep conviction that that final version of the "Teachers Charter" will fully meet your expectations./

Soon there will take place a plenary session of the Sejm devoted to the state and developmental trends of Polish education, in accordance with the long-advanced postulates of the Sejm Commission for Education and Upbringing and the ZNP congress. At that session--in accordance with legislative procedure--the first reading of the draft of the "Teachers' Charter' will take place. Next, the draft of that bill will be transmitted to the Commission for Education and Upbringing and the Commission for Legislative Work, which, on utilizing the results of public consultations, plenary discussions of the Sejm, and the personal concepts and opinions of the deputies, will prepare the final version of the draft of the bill, on introducing corrections, additions, and revisions. As approved by the commission, the draft of the bill will be presented for final approval to the Sejm. It is my hope that, despite the huge volume of work facing us, the bill will be voted upon as early as this coming November. The date on which it will become effective will be determined by the Sejm.

To maximally shorten the time of the work on the draft of the bill, the Commission for Education and Upbringing has decided, even before its first reading, to commence consultations with the teaching community. This week the commission presidium will meet with representatives of the leadership of ZNP-Education and the National Section for Education and Upbringing, NSZZ Solidarity. Representatives of both unions from the teaching community will be regularly invited to the commission's sessions, as is the custom introduced earlier. In this way, the final shape of the bill will be the result of joint work.

The version of draft of the bill transmitted to the government by the minister of education and upbringing was not entirely agreed upon between the ministry and both trade unions. To be sure, much had been jointly resolved, including some of the most important paragraphs. Certain problems, however, still await further discussion and resolution. The memorandum of differences transmitted to the government along with the draft of the bill by the minister of education and upbringing is fairly long. It is also worth noting that the differences with regard to several questions (if only, for examples the issue of what the bill should be named) between the ZNP and NSZZ Solidarity are quite considerable. /It is one of the commission's roles to reconcile positions, to try for a common consensus in proposing a solution and, in particularly difficult cases, to propose compromise solutions. I mention this in order to show that the task of the Commission for Education and Upbringing is not easy./

In the very near future deputies will begin to meet with their voters-teachers. /My ardent request to my colleagues [fellow teachers] is that they share with the deputies their comments, suggestions, and proposals and meet with them in an objective and constructive atmosphere. All suggestions and opinions will be considered, thoroughly examined, and weighed in the work on the final shape of the text of the bill. As a Sejm commission we have the complete right to present to the Sejm that version of the draft of the bill which we shall jointly regard as the most just and most adequate to the needs of Polish education and the feelings, opinions, and position of the teacher community./ In our work on the charter we will be able to settle many matters and details, including, e.g., the problem of "teacher-librarians" (rather than "school librarians" as formulated in the corresponding provision in the government's draft of the charter), on bearing in mind that this bill will also open the road toward further regulations intended to prepare a new decree on the national education system.

/I will continue to keep my colleagues [fellow teachers] posted about all work relating to the charter in the pages of GLOS NAUCZYCIELSKI./

Sejm Speech of Minister Faron

Warsaw TRYBUNA LUDU in Polish 2 Nov 81 pp 3,4

[PAP report on speech by Minister B. Faron: "Updated Draft of the 'Teachers' Charter'"; passages enclosed in slantlines printed in boldface]

[Text] /Justifying the draft of the bill known as "Teachers' Charter," B. Faron stated that it settles the basic aspects of the status of teachers, on voiding those provisions in the 1972 decree, "Charter of the Teacher's Rights and Duties," which no longer find application and at present do not meet the expectations of teachers./

The changes occurring in the nation's economic, social, and political life since August of last year have affected schools as well. Recently many decisions have been made to alter the work of schools, to deepen it and make it more authentic, both for teachers and students. Revisions have been made in the curriculums, especially with regard to the humanities and social sciences, and decisions regulating the inner life of the school, its administration, and the work of teachers have been taken. Lastly, as of the new school year, the material situation of teachers has improved to some extent. Despite economic difficulties, the government has decided to raise salaries and shorten the weekly number of teaching hours. As Minister Faron stated, these decisions represent a preliminary adjustment of the disproportions that had existed in teachers' salaries compared to other professional groups with analogous educational background. They are the first stage in the implementation of a program for improving the material situation of educators and revising the obligations contained in social contracts whose integral reflection can be found in the "Teachers' Charter" being presented today to the High Chamber.

That charter is an important element in the government's actions to improve the situation in Polish education and enhance the status of the teaching profession. The draft of the charter presented today does not yet meet all the expectations of educators. It is being widely discussed within the teacher community, and dissatisfaction has been expressed concerning some of the solutions it contains. There also exist many misunderstandings and lack of clarity concerning that draft as regards, among other things, the schedule for the implementation of the charter.

The working team for the preliminary drafting of the charter bill was appointed in the fall of last year. The project for updating the charter was submitted to the social commission last February, and early in May a revised version of the draft was published in GLOS NAUCZYCIELSKI in order to familiarize the broad teaching community with its text. At the same time, the draft was distributed for consultation among the ministries and political parties, among others, the PZPR Central Committee, the Supreme Committee of the United Peasant Party [ZSL], and the Central Committee of the Democratic Party [SD]. The Sejm Commission for Education and Upbringing was kept posted about the work on the draft. In view of the difference in opinions about the status of teachers--a topic which the Polish Teachers Union [ZNP] has always believed worthy of inclusion in the charter, whereas the Teachers' Branch of Solidarity proposed settling this issue in a more general way, as part of a collective-bargaining agreement, the Sejm commission undertook the role of a mediator between these two unions. Early in July, this led to a rapprochement of positions, but it has also caused delays in transmitting the draft of the bill to the government. The transmittal finally took place on 16 July.

The full implementation of the charter will require additional outlays of about 34 billion zlotys on education. In accordance with the proposal by the trade unions and the resolution of the Ninth PZPR Congress, the Ministry of Education and Upbringing proposed implementing the charter within the period of up to 1983. In view of the country's difficult economic situation, the government, while accepting the idea of outlays on this scale, postponed spending about 9.9 billion zlotys until 1984 and about 2 billion zlotys until 1985. This was the version of the draft of the bill that was approved by the government presidium, and the premier transmitted that draft to the Sejm on 7 October. In accordance with yesterday's declaration by Premier Wojciech Jaruzelski, the government has recently decided to shorten by 1 year the proposed period of financing the "Teachers' Charter," by moving forward about 6 billion zlotys to as early as the year 1982. This means that a sizable part of the rights contained in the charter will be translated into reality as of 1982. The presented schedule of work on the charter indicates that the government spent relatively very little time on drafting the text of the bill, without either being tardy or, the more so, underestimating the problems of teachers.

In the course of legislative work, the government has also introduced certain revisions in some provisions of the proposed bill that had been negotiated at the ministerial level. This concerns not only the aforementioned shortening of the period of implementation of the charter but also an increase in the extra pension allowance and, among other things, the awarding of the Order of Polonia Restituta to teachers who completed 30 years of pedagogical work and the extension of special free-housing privileges to all teachers employed in cities with a population of up to 5,000.

As regards the extra allowance for pensioners and annuitants who had engaged in clandestine teaching, the government proposes that this question be resolved in the "War Veteran's Charter," because then persons who have abandoned the teaching profession could also be eligible for this allowance. As regards the automatic awarding of the Order of Polonia Restituta, the government adopts the premise that such a procedure for awarding decorations of such high rank would not be socially justified even for persons engaged in such an important profession. hence the government proposes a mandatory submission of proposals for awarding this decoration to teachers, instead of its automatic awarding.

Considerable anxiety has been caused to teachers by the revision of the provision governing average salaries. The draft presented by the Ministry of Education and Upbringing states that "it may not be lower than the average wage of engineers and technicians employed in industry," whereas the government's draft states that this salary "should not be lower."

The minister cited only certain instances of the disparities between the draft presented by the government and the document received by the Sejm, and he offered a justification for the government's revisions. Altogether there are 13 major disparities and for all of them the government justifies the necessity of revisions by either the possibility of settling the concerned issues in a more general way, through separate regulations, or in view of the deviations of the proposed provisions from the legal norms in force.

Irrespective of these disputed issues, the government has decided to present to the High Chamber the draft of the "Teachers' Charter" in full consciousness that this document can be improved and finalized precisely in the forum of the Sejm and in the Sejm commissions. The government's draft of the bill contains many favorable solutions for those employed in this unusually difficult and responsible profession. The charter postulates, among other things, another stage of shortening the weekly work week to 18 hours for teachers in elementary and secondary schools. In addition, it restricts, among other things, the possibility of burdening teachers with unpaid teaching and upbringing activities as well as with overtime hours without their consent. The average wage of engineers and technicians is regarded as a fixed criterion for determining the salary level of teachers. Along with this, the draft of the bill grants seniority pay allowances to teachers, e.g. 10 percent after 10 years, 15 percent after 15 years, and 20 percent after 20 years, as well as anniversary bonuses for 20, 25 and 30 years of work. The periods of waiting for promotion are moreover shortened from 4 to 2 years and the number of promotions is increased from 6 to 15. These provisions meet the demands advanced by teachers throughout the period of existence of the People's Poland, while the determination of the salary level according to that paid to engineers and technicians prevents once and for all a decrease in teachers' salaries in relation to other professional categories with the same educational background. In addition, the draft of the bill markedly broadens the rights of teachers to social security and pensions and offers definite priorities for teachers who work in rural and so-called deficit [shortage] areas. Further, the provisions contained in the draft are closer to the universal labor law code. This concerns in particular employee hiring and discharge procedures and pay allowances for vacation leaves, disciplinary penalties, etc.

The draft of the bill imposes on the employer the duty of assuring teachers with basic working conditions for the implementation of teaching-upbringing activities, and it obligates the minister of education and upbringing to define these conditions. It also abolishes traditional bureaucratic restrictions on the teacher's work and is intended to enhance his role in implementing the tasks of the school. It moreover eliminates provisions which have glaringly violated the principles of justice by permitting the discharge of tenured teachers without their consent and without disciplinary proceedings. Further, the draft grants to teachers' councils certain rights relating to [codetermination of] the appointment of directors of schools and educational institutions.

The government's draft of the bill takes into account the universal, deep and justified criticism by teachers with regard to their current legal status and material and social position. It translates into reality most of the teachers' demands recorded in the public agreements between the ministry and government, on the one hand, and the teachers' trade unions, on the other.

The "Teachers' Charter" not only defines the rights of teachers, it also defines in detail their obligations, including the education of young people in the spirit of love for the fatherland, socialist principles of social coexistence, social justice, legality, and fraternity of working people throughout the world. The charter also mentions the duty of promoting the ideals of peace, caring for the broad development of personality in pupils, and fostering attitudes of active participation in the life of the country and the nation.

The charter also defines the required qualifications of teachers, specifying that persons with higher education that includes adequate teacher training and who display the proper moral attitude may be teachers. The duties enumerated in that document also include the necessity of consistent self-enhancement of knowledge and professional skills by the teacher.

Minister Boleslaw Faron stressed that, in his broad presentation of the progress of the work so far on the draft of the "Teachers' Charter" and of the principal provisions it contains, he has not concealed the disparities that have emerged between the version agreed upon between the ministry and the trade unions, on the one hand, and the final government version, on the other. Here he guided himself by the fact that the passions and discussions aroused by this draft are sometimes based on misconceptions, on an incomplete familiarity with the text. Hence he is convinced that the Sejm will, on making allowance for the proposals made during the discussions and for the position of the Sejm commissions for Legislative Work and for Education and Upbringing, vote a bill meeting the expectations of teachers.

ORTHODOX PRIESTS CRITICIZE CHURCH HIERARCHY

Paris BULETIN DE INFORMATIE PENTRU ROMANI IN EXIL in Romanian 1 Dec 1981 p 10

[Unsigned article: "Romanian Orthodox Priests Criticize the Ecclesiastic Hierarchy"]

[Text] According to documents published underground in Romania, five Romanian orthodox priests, members of the "Romanian Christian Committee," were victims of diverse types of harassment and persecution as a result of their writings in "Testimony of Faith," addressed to the patriarch of Romania. In this "Testimony," the authors criticize the attitude of the ecclesiastic officials, considering it "a prostituion of the Church." They say that the Church should not be involved in politics. If on a domestic level the Church has shown itself to be authoritarian, as it is on a foreign level, in Romania it is totally subservient to the atheist authorities. Religious affairs are compromised by a ritual lacking grace and by an orientation towards sterility, materialism and hypocrisy. The five priests, Liviu Negoita, Viorel Dumitrescu, Ambrus Cernat, Cornel Avramescu and Ionel Vinchici, stated that this situation must be changed and demanded: the implementation of the right to give children a religious education and the organization of a young Christian movement; individual ecumenical freedom without any constraints; the right to organize pilgrimages; the right to have access to the information media, radio and television; the release of Father Calciu from prison; the reintroduction of the "Lord's Army" movement; and the recognition of the Unified Church as the sister and supporter of Orthodox spiritual life.

The Patriarch did not directly respond to the "Testimony of Faith." Bishop N. Corneau met twice, however, with Father Negoita, urging him to renounce the ecumenical ideas in the document. Not only did he not renounce them, but in August Father Negoita wrote a letter to the publishing house that produces the journal MITROPOLITUL BANATULUI protesting an article that appeared there stating that the "priests' yoke" involves "spiritual restrictions" and implicitly criticizing the position of the reformist priests in the "Romanian Christian Committee." They were warned that they are using "ideas foreign to the Church" and "actions that have not connection with the Church!". Father Negoita objected that the Church cannot be reduced to a state of immutability.

After a long visit to Bishop Ploscaru on 30 June 1981, Fathers L. Negoita and Viorel Dumitrescu were stopped on the street and "invited" to the militia office, threatened and beaten. Later, Bishop Corneau reproached Father Negoita for having too long a conversation with Bishop Ploscaru...

Father Cernat was arrested in May, interrogated for 6 hours and threatened with physical torture (the investigator ironically told him "that the spikes will come out by themselves and he will fly over the machine). Before being released, he signed a "confession" and he was told that he must give up his work and that he would no loner receive a salary. Father Cernat replied that he would work without a salary. At the end of July, he was visited by Bishop Nicolae who informed him that he must go, that if he did not he would close the church and kick him out into "the street." Father Cernat is currently under strict supervision, is not permitted to carry out his profession as a priest and is used only in auxiliary, support work.

Father Vinchici was also dismissed and no longer has a job.

EMIGRE SOURCE EXAMINES MEASURES FOR REDUCING WORK TIME

Paris BULETIN DE INFORMATIE PENTRU ROMANI IN EXIL in Romanian 1 Dec 81 p 7

[Unsigned article: "Reducing the Length of the Workweek"]

[Text] The workers' strikes of July and August 1977 and the very powerful repression (arrests, tortures, worker transfers) brought about a decrease in labor productivity. The investigative organs of the apparatus (we understand this to mean the Party and the Government) arrived at the conclusion (copied from Western studies) that there was an incipient deterioration of the national workforce that would express itself in more and more violent outbreaks.

As a good student of Stalinist education (the only one who benefitted), Ceausescu proposed in September 1977 the reduction of the length of the workweek as a safety valve. This was followed by the December 1977 National Conference of the Romanian Communist Party [RCP] and the 12th RCP Congress which approved a program for the graduated reduction of the length of the workweek from 48 hours to 46 hours and the granting of 1 additional day off per month.

Clearly, this reduction was based not on an equal level of productivity, but on an increased one. Thus, for the normal fulfillment of tasks the ministries, the central and local organs, the industrial centrals and the economic units, with the participation of the so-called trade unions headed by the RCP organs, took over 28,000 measures that were to create a savings of 486 million man-hours per year, correlated with an increase in productivity of 4.2 percent in 1981, and "a better use of work time." Very detailed plans were made by sectors of production and the date 31 December 1981 was set as the end of the operation.

Additionally, the operation was also contingent upon countless local factors. Thus, according to the vicious criteria established by the party, the day off (the first Saturday of the month and not a full day) would be granted to enterprises on the basis of monthly achievements or achievements accumulated since the beginning of the year and the following plan indicators: the value of sold and paid-for goods production; physical industrial production by items; labor productivity based on net production; product quality; exports, including deliveries for export as established through cooperation with sub-contracting units; maximum expenditures per 1,000 lei of goods production.

The first five indicators could be expressed in an accounting format. The last, which appears to be the most simple, still does not have an arithmetic formula.

It should be noted that in those enterprises that require continuous operations the day off could be postponed or accumulated during a period of restricted operations, while in the administrative and service sectors the days off could be postponed for months.

By August 1981, in other words 32 months into the 36 month program, the apparatus of the Socialist Republic of Romania stated that 75 percent of the total number of workers were benefitting from a 46-hour workweek, with the day off not being given only in rare cases.

At the 14 July 1981 working session of the Political Executive Committee of the RCP Central Committee that preceded Ceausescu's visit to the Crimea to see Brezhnev, it was decided that "in order to reduce the workweek it is necessary to achieve the same amount of production in a shorter period of time." After two and one-half years since the beginning of the operation, neither the apparatus nor the rest of the country had understood that they were talking about a reduction in work time.

To the instructions that had come down from the top, the work units had answered, as they had understood, with the inherent delays in a troublesome program by reorganizing production and labor, by requesting machinery and equipment to automate the work processes (at a time when Romania's foreign credit is considerably reduced) and by raising the level of professional qualifications of the different categories of personnel. All these phases cannot be quickly resolved.

Thus, the program for reducing the length of the workweek as promised 3 years ago is a new failure. This measure is not limited, however, to the failure to make good on the promises to the workers. "Scientific" organization immediately requires the intensive use of machinery and equipment. Those personnel having a lower level of qualifications became "unproductive" and, together with "auxiliary" personnel, they were put on leave as "unfit for certain production activities."

Thus, a group of unemployed workers was created that goes from city to city looking for work. A large part of these workers are pushed to committing delinquent acts and the statistical analysis of the Romanian press in recent months reveals a spectacular increase in all kinds of robberies and criminal acts committed by these uprooted people. An important part of the black market business, which the Romanian apparatus blames for contributing to the endemic poor supply situation among the people, is in the hands of these people.

When countries that are no less richer and have no more advantageous positions in international situations on the European continent begin programs to reduce the workweek from 40 hours to 38 or even 35 hours and when working more than 42 hours is considered illegal and trade unions state that it is even damaging to the health of the workers, the undermining of the failing regime in Romania becomes a national duty.

The living conditions of the Romanian workers, which are much poorer than those of the Polish workers, must be denounced by all the elements of exiled Romanians.

ULTRALEFTIST VIEWS OF LCY ROLE REJECTED

Belgrade KOMUNIST in Serbo-Croatian 20 Nov 81 p 20

[Article by Petar Mandic: "The League of Communists and Democratic Centralism; Element Instead of Organized Action"; Passages within slant lines in bold face]

[Text] The conception is popular that the ideological function of the LCY will become stronger to the extent in which the process of liberalization of its internal life has taken effect, that is, if it has reduced its occupation with the questions of its organizational and political construction in the spirit of democratic centralism.

This conception proceeds from the fact that democratic centralism is incompatible with the new role of the LCY in a self-managed society and that "according to the character of the relations which it assumes, it is incompatible with self-managed democracy." Challenging the role of the LCY and negating democratic centralism, the anarchist-liberals develop the thesis that /democracy/ and /centralism/ in the LCY come into irreconcilable opposition which can only be resolved by excluding /centralism/. They are particularly insistent that "democratic centralism is the source of the latent conflict of principle and the creative personality," that this is the principle with the help of which "membership is manipulated for the sake of leadership," that it is the "source of making relations in the LCY and in society bureaucratic," that it "separates people and their ideas," etc. Making the LCY democratic should be expressed in such a way that the character of its internal relations would enable minorities, even if they have antisocialistic ideological positions, to work freely and to struggle for their positions. In such a vision of democracy, "freedom" is conceived of as a category outside of class, as the right to work in the movement and against its interests, as "freedom for everyone," even for the class enemy, as the right without the responsibility for the consequences which come into being for the movement because of such activity.

The "Incompatibility" of Order and the Movement

The character of the anarchist-liberal concept of democracy and of the role of the LCY is best revealed by its "radicalized wing" which is known as the "new left" or the "ultraleft." Although it tries to present itself as the protagonist for new beginnings in the development of socialism, the ultraleft reveals its ideological orientation by the measures it proposes in order to "radicalize" and "to make democratic" social relations, and to get out of the existing "vicious circle."

Both the advocates of this ideological movement and the classical anarchist-liberals direct their basic activity against the LCY and its organized work on the principle of democratic centralism, as well as against the institution of the political system of socialistic self-management. It is worth saying that here there is nothing about criticism of the existing, but about negation of everything existing, about the demand for the destruction of the institution of the self-managed society in the name of some abstract interests of the working class. The basic ideological inspiration of this false leftwing "radicalism" is anarchism, with its motto in the thesis "that order and the movement are absolutely incompatible" and that they are "two diametrically opposed political phenomena."

The nihilistic concern of the ultraleftwinger emerges in the explicit assertions that "in today's world, socialistic self-management is the only utopia," that it is incompatible with today's reality, and as such it must be discarded as a real alternative. Insisting on spontaneity as a method of struggle for socialism, and struggling against democratic centralism as an organizational principle of the LCY, the ultraleftwing favors the point of view according to which "the spontaneity of class and the activity of the party organization are mutually excluded or sharply opposed to each other."

The LCY should operate exclusively on the basis of empirical consciousness, spontaneously, independent and ouside of party leadership. The ultraleft particularly insists on the viewpoint that behind the concepts of democratic centralism is concealed the "the most glaring form of bureaucratic centralization and the dictatorship of the party apparatus."

The ultraleftist destructive tendencies in relation to the LCY and its spiritual identity with the philosophy of Dilas emerge from the position of its advocates toward the manner of organization of the LCY. They find proof of the bureaucratic structuring of the LCY in the fact that the membership is not organized arbitrarily, "according to the way it is found," but in accordance with the "organizational scheme which is issued by the leadership," alluding to the Statutes of the LCY. The ultraleftwingers, as well as all opportunistic petit-bourgeois intellectuals, as Lenin warned, are bothered by discipline and organization, as well as the understanding which democratic centralism presupposes.

The aversion the ultraleft feels for the LCY is well expressed in the position that it has survived organization because of its Leninist nature. And since everyone from Dilas to his "radical" followers are united in the position that Leninism is the forerunner of Stalinism, they reach the conclusion that the LCY is "incompatible with self-management." In their opinion, the League of Communists, as long as it exists as an organization which constructs its relations on the principle of democratic centralism, will be the impetus for making relations in society bureaucratic, and because of this it must be abolished or given an auxilliary role.

The search for an "alternative to the existing" does not only mean a plea that an alternative to self-management be found, but also to the leadership role of the working class and of the LCY which, it is asserted, have not been acknowledged as revolutionary subjects because they themselves have been "make bureaucratic," especially the LCY, which has been transformed into the "sclerotic party of the movement." In order for the new "avantguarde" to be able to implement its role, the ultraleft aggressively comes out with the demand that it be given free space for operating outside the institution of the political system.

Lack of Faith in the Working Class

One should not, however, live under the illusion that the anarchist-liberals and the ultraleftwingers are genuine supporters of spontaneous and unlimited democracy for all. There is nothing about this. In question is the ideological vision which has as its goal--under the guise of the struggle for democracy--the breaking up of the institution of the political system of socialistic self-management, which is proclaimed as undemocratic, so that a state of division and anarchy emerges, in which then would appear on the scene those forces which would, having seized control, create its own system which might be even a form of restoration of the dogmatic Stalinistic variation of socialism, or a multiparty system with limited civil freedoms, or everything else but a true system of socialistic self-managed democracy.

In every case, the road from anarchy has never led to democracy, nor is this the goal of the anarchist-liberals. In reality, we are dealing with false radicalism. To be radical in the Marxist sense of the word means to begin with man and his specific life situation. The struggle for the resolution of the concrete problems for the economic and political emancipation of society is not possible without concrete critical analysis of social reality and the solving of the problems which inhibit the process of the liberation of labor and the working class. But the ultraleft does not make use of this method of analysis, instead negating all of the existing structure, and so in the name of false humanism it is transformed into a destructive force of society and into the most extreme protagonist of the struggle against the socialistic self-management values of society.

Marxist-based criticism is not and cannot be only a judge of the existing reality, but also must be a vision of a new, approaching one, as well as a response to the challenges of the contemporary struggle for socialism. Its revolutionary dimension consists in this. Instead of a Marxist analysis of social reality, the ultraleft makes use of an impressionistic philosophy, creating a utipian plan for society and the "liberation of man." Thus the notion of the hopelessness of society and the uncertainty of perspective of our self-management development is created. By its lack of faith in the working class as a historic subject, and by its search for a new historic alternative to the existing forces of society, that is, the working class and the LCY, the ultraleft in the best way possible reveals its petit-bourgeois ideological orientation and character. The implementation of its goals is possible only under the assumption that the LCY is indeed to be removed from the political scene. Only in this way is it possible to understand the revulsion of the anarchist-liberals and the ultraleftwing for the social role of the LCY. That is why they support the destruction of the pillars of its ideological and organizational construction, which are expressed in democratic centralism. Without these pillars, there would indeed be no LCY.

Although the LCY finds itself in an irreconcilable conflict with these ideological tendencies, they sometimes succeed in influencing the content and method of its work and the construction of its internal relations. These influences appear in the formalism of the work of some organizations and agencies, that is, in conceptions that it is enough on principle to discuss phenomena and the task of the LCY is finished. According to this reasoning, the implementation of these assignments is a matter for other organizations and agencies. It is not uncommon for social problems to be approached without entering into all sides of their political, social and economic essence, the establishment of their causes is overlooked and the responsibility for them is avoided.

Making relations in the LCY democratic is still perceived here and there as the right of individuals and organizations, under the guise of freedom of expression for a pluralism of self-management interests, to legalize rights of some economic and social subjects to insist without limitation on biased, local and individual group interests, independent of how much they agree with the broad interests of the society and associated labor. On this basis appear tendencies that a significant number of basic organizations of the LCY often identify with the interests of their own basic organizations of associated labor, independent of what is the class essence of these interests, that is, whether these interests are the expression of the broad interests of society and associated labor or are the expression of localism, particularism and regionalism.

ASSEMBLY OFFICIAL INTERVIEWED ON DELEGATES' PAY, DUTIES

Belgrade NEDELJNE INFORMATIVNE NOVINE in Serbo-Croatian No 1611, 15 Nov 81 pp 15-17

[Interview with Janez Lukas, secretary general of the SFRY Assembly, by Svetislav Spasojevic: "Under the Assembly Dome"; date and place not specified]

[Text] Hardly a day passes that some Yugoslav newspaper does not publish at least one news item coming from the Yugoslav Assembly. This institution is probably the largest source of news in the country. It is another matter that almost nothing is known about the delegates who spend long and strenuous hours in the Assembly and about the people who are employed in it.

The chambers of the SFRY Assembly held 84 meetings with a total of 924 agenda items from 15 May 1978 to the end of this October! In that time each delegate of the Federal Chamber received 3,942 pieces of documentary material with a total of 42,941 pages. His counterpart in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces received 5,958 pieces of material printed on 50,165 pages. This is a job which, as one often hears in the Assembly, cannot always be done as it should be. Which raises the question of who are the people who have managed to study so many pieces of material in such a relatively short time and make decisions on the basis of that material which have very often been decisive for the country.

A picture of the Assembly from within must among other things contain data on the composition of the delegates with respect to age. There are 5 delegates between the ages of 20 and 30, 40 between the ages of 30 and 40, 74 delegates between 40 and 50, 131 delegates between 50 and 60, and 55 delegates between 60 and 70.

The figures eloquently indicate that the delegates are of a certain age and experience. There are more of them between the ages of 60 and 70 than those between 20 and 40, the youngest age group.

Occupations

The total of 308 delegates are divided as follows: 220 in the Federal Chamber and 88 in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces. There are 44 women delegates in the Federal Chamber and 10 in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces. In the Federal Chamber 135 delegates have senior postsecondary schooling; in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces there are 36. There are 53 delegates in the Federal Chamber and 13 delegates in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces with junior postsecondary schooling. There are 29 delegates in the Federal Chamber and 8 delegates in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces with secondary specialized training. In each chamber there are two delegates with elementary schooling.

In the Federal Chamber there are 63 sociopolitical workers and 67 in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces; in the Federal Chamber 21 economists and in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces 6; in the Federal Chamber 12 lawyers and in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces 2; in the Federal Chamber 40 engineers and in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces 2; in the Federal Chamber 12 members of the armed forces and in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces 1; in the Federal Chamber 6 physicians, 2 veterinarians and 7 educationists, but in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces 1 educationist; in the Federal Chamber 1 writer and 1 newsman; 5 enterprise directors in the Federal Chamber and 6 in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces; 14 highly skilled workers in the Federal Chamber and 1 in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces. Also, there are in the Federal Chamber 11 technicians, 13 skilled workers, 1 actor, 2 farmers and 2 nurses.

Of the 320 delegates in the two chambers, 130 are sociopolitical workers. The others are employed and often say that their position is not equitable, since aside from their regular job, they also perform the extremely important duty of being a delegate.

Personal Incomes

The compensation for personal income paid to the delegate in the Yugoslav Assembly is regulated by a specific law and a social compact. A delegate who does not hold one of several elective offices is entitled to the same personal income he had over the last 12 or 6 months in the work organization in which he was employed. The rule for a delegate who does hold one of the elective offices is this: "... The personal income is arrived at by taking as the base the average personal income of employees in the SFRY economy, which is increased by a specified adjustment." For the chairmen of the Assembly's working bodies, for example, the adjustment factor applied is 3.8. Past labor is added to the amount obtained in this way. The compensation for personal income paid, say, to the chairman of a working body or one of the committees is 23,350 dinars without past labor and 28,645 dinars if he has 30 years of pensionable service.

The delegate also receives what is referred to as a supplement, which amounts to 2,000 dinars per month. In practice there are cases where the delegate receives a smaller personal income than what he had in his former job. The administrative commission of the SFRY Assembly is authorized on the recommendation of the administrative commissions of the republics and provinces to make occasional adjustments in the personal income of a delegate in order to compensate for that difference.

Here are the personal incomes of the officeholders elected or appointed by the SFRY Assembly, with and without past labor:

The president of the Assembly receives 32,021 dinars without past labor and 37,625 dinars with it; the vice presidents of the Assembly 28,018 dinars and 32,921 dinars, respectively; the presidents of the chambers 28,018 (32,921); chairmen of committees of the chambers and joint committees 25,350 (29,786); delegates in the Federal Chamber from 17,463 to 30,560, including past labor; delegates in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces from 19,720 to 33,306 dinars, including past labor; officeholders whose term of office has expired from 25,867 to 29,819 dinars, including past labor; the secretary general of the SFRY Assembly 24,683 dinars without past labor and 29,003 dinars with it; the deputy secretary general, the chamber secretary and the secretary for legislation from 25,566 to 27,434 dinars; staff administrators appointed by the Presidency of the SFRY Assembly and councilors of the Yugoslav Assembly (including past labor) from 22,308 to 27,435 dinars; secretaries of committees and secretaries of joint commissions from 22,201 to 27,202 dinars, including past labor; and assistants to the secretary general, secretaries of staff services, the head of the Office of the President of the SFRY Assembly, and the chief of protocol of the SFRY Assembly from 22,527 to 26,650 dinars, including past labor.

The chairman of the Federal Executive Council has the same base pay as the president of the Yugoslav Assembly. The "base" of the president of the Yugoslav Constitutional Court is about 3,000 dinars less. The vice chairmen of the Federal Executive Council have the same personal income as the vice presidents of the SFRY Assembly, not including past labor, the members of the Federal Executive Council, the judges of the Constitutional Court of Yugoslavia and the president of the Federal Court have the same personal income as vice presidents of the chambers of the SFRY Assembly and the chairmen of working bodies in the Yugoslav Assembly, not including past labor.

Full-Fledged Apartment or Furnished Bachelor's Apartment

An order which is now under consideration by the delegates provides that a delegate elected as a holder of office in the SFRY Assembly may receive an apartment for temporary use so long as he holds that office, that is, so long as he does that work and performs those tasks, or for permanent use with the right of tenancy. An apartment which is allocated for temporary use (official apartment) does not come with the right of tenancy, and it must be returned upon expiration of the officeholder's term.

The right of tenancy can be acquired, that is, a delegate can receive an apartment for permanent use if he is an officeholder who does not have a dwelling and is moving his family to Belgrade, but he may not have the right of tenancy to two dwellings, since he must return the dwelling in his previous place of residence. If another apartment is allotted to him upon expiration of his term of office, for example, in his own republic or province, the apartment is returned to the housing stock of the Federation. In short, delegates who hold office have the same rights as any citizen, and the Law on Housing Relations which applies to everyone applies to them as well. The exception is the so-called official apartment, which makes it possible for the delegate holding office in Belgrade to perform his duty. This apartment, a bachelor's apartment as a rule, is furnished, and he must pay all the costs for it and depreciation on the furnishings.

Languages and Scripts

Speeches in the Yugoslav Assembly are translated simultaneously--in both directions--to and from Serbo-Croatian, Slovenian, Albanian and Hungarian. All documentary materials are translated and printed in the following languages (according to the terminology used in the Assembly): Serbo-Croatian (Cyrillic), Croatian literary language (Latin script), Serbo-Croatian or Croato-Serbian in the ijekavski dialect used in SR Bosnia-Hercegovina (Cyrillic and Latin alternately), Slovenian, Macedonian, Albanian and Hungarian.

These are just some of the facts we talked about with Janez Lukas, secretary general of the SFRY Assembly, in our desire to create a picture of the "parliament from within."

[Question] It is often said that the delegates carry a heavy load. What is the total number of sessions that have been held in this convocation and how many items have been on the agenda?

[Answer] In performing their principal function of establishing policy and adopting laws and other general acts, the chambers of the SFRY Assembly have held 84 sessions from 15 May 1978 to 31 October of this year, with a total of 924 points on the agenda. The Federal Chamber held 37 sessions with 508 items on the agenda, and the Chamber of Republics and Provinces 47 sessions with 416 items on the agenda. Joint working bodies of the Yugoslav Assembly held 233 meetings with 1,160 points on the agenda. The working bodies of the Federal Chamber have had 496 meetings and 2,593 points on the agenda, and those of the Chamber of Republics and Provinces 514 meetings with 2,182 points on the agenda. The working bodies have also held 35 joint meetings with 48 items on the agenda. In addition, the Presidency of the SFRY Assembly has held 43 meetings with a total of 240 items on the agenda.

[Question] Is it possible for every delegate to do a proper job of reading the pages of various pieces of material every month or every year?

[Answer] In its meetings the Federal Chamber has taken up 172 drafts or proposed versions of laws, 119 proposed versions of orders and 47 proposed versions of other general acts. The Chamber of Republics and Provinces has in its sessions taken up 102 proposed versions of laws, 99 proposed versions of orders and 73 proposed versions of other general acts. Every delegate of the Federal Chamber, from 15 May 1978 to 31 October of this year, has received 3,942 pieces of documentary material with a total of 42,941 pages. This means that every delegate in the Federal Chamber has received on the average 94 pieces of material per month with 1,020 pages. A delegate in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces has over that same period received 5,968 pieces of documentary material with a total of 50,165 pages, or a monthly average of 142 pieces with a total of 1,194 pages. Yet I am not mentioning to you the material which is also regularly sent to the delegates from the various working bodies in the SFRY Assembly, informative materials issued by the Staff Service for Documentation, the Staff Service for Information, the Social Accounting Service, or the Assembly's Herald.... Last year, for example, the Assembly's print shop printed 32,671,000 pages in format A-4 and consumed 115 tons of paper. In the first 9 months of this year it has already printed 39.1 million pages in that same format and consumed 120 tons of paper.

[Question] The observation has been made, though, to be sure, it is not uttered too loud, nor often, that the delegates substitute a few leading officeholders in the republics for their own constituency and consult only them concerning their activity.

[Answer] Performance of the jobs and tasks within the competency of the SFRY Assembly does not depend solely on the effective work of the delegates in it, but to a considerable extent on the successful functioning of the delegate system as a whole and on its capacity to perform the social role which it has in the process of the mode of operation and decisionmaking based on delegacy. Concerning every significant decision a democratic procedure has to be conducted in which organizations of associated labor and other self-managing organizations and communities and sociopolitical organizations, as well as their delegations, state their position, and with respect to decisions within the jurisdiction of the Chamber of Republics and Provinces, consent of the republic and provincial assemblies is also required. In order to make it possible for the delegations in the delegate base to state their positions, the material which has been proposed for consideration in the SFRY Assembly has to be worked up, that is, summaries have to be prepared of the positions and decisions proposed, and these are then published in the Assembly Herald, which is intended for the delegations. It comes out every 14 days, except during the summer recess of the Assembly, in 14 different editions in the languages of the nationalities of Yugoslavia and in the languages of the ethnic minorities (in Albanian, Hungarian, Ruthenian, Slovak, Romanian and Turkish). This Herald is received by a total of 78,210 delegations of the principal self-managing organizations and communities and sociopolitical organizations. Its circulation, incidentally, is 450,000 copies.

Debate in All the Languages

[Question] The democratic procedure of stating positions and reconciliation of positions on proposals and stands has on several occasions been frustrated because laws were passed by emergency and abbreviated procedure. Do you know the figures that might illustrate this assertion?

[Answer] According to the regular procedure for adoption of acts in the Federal Chamber, proposed versions must be delivered to the delegates 60 days before consideration, while in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces the period is 45 days. From the beginning of this term, that is, since 15 May 1978, up to the end of 1980 the Federal Chamber had adopted 94 laws through regular procedure and 14 by abbreviated procedure, and 19 laws were adopted by emergency procedure. In the Chamber of Republics and Provinces 54 laws were adopted by regular procedure and 41 by abbreviated procedure.

[Question] There are representatives of all the nationalities and ethnic minorities in the Yugoslav Assembly. Has it been made possible for them to follow the debate in their own language? How much has the demand for translation and other work which must be done by people employed in the Assembly affected the size of the staff?

[Answer] There is a well-organized staff service for translations into the languages of the nationalities and ethnic minorities. Last year it translated and edited 73,766 pages. In addition, there were over that same period 230 hours of simultaneous interpreting. In the first 10 months of this year more than 50,000 pages have already been translated. Specialized, technical and organizational tasks are performed for the Assembly by its staff services, which have a work force of 675. This is a large staff. A number of measures are in the works to reduce its size and to establish an optimum and efficient organization of the staff services. Resolutions which the Presidency of the SFRY Assembly and the Administrative Commission adopted last year prohibiting an increase in the size of the staff services of the Assembly, together with the specific program of the work community and sociopolitical organizations on economy and efficient conduct of business, are already being implemented. The staff members themselves have made a great effort to use their worktime as efficiently and optimally as possible and to perform additional jobs on their own through flexible organization, rescheduling of worktime, staggered working hours and work on more than one shift, thereby avoiding overtime.

[Question] How many delegates receive their personal income in the Yugoslav Assembly?

[Answer] There are 74 delegates who receive their personal income or compensation for personal income in the Federal Chamber and 76 in the Chamber of Republics and Provinces. The other delegates obtain their personal income from the work organization in which they are employed.

[Question] What has happened with what is referred to as "Brkic's law"? That is, there is a law on officeholders whereby delegates can receive a personal income even after their term of office has expired if they have not been assigned to a new position.

[Answer] Those officeholders who were elected and appointed in the SFRY Assembly, but have not been assigned to other jobs upon expiration of their term of office, are receiving personal income or compensation for personal income on the basis of the special law in the SFRY Assembly. Upon expiration of the term of the Assembly convocation between 1974 and 1978 this right has been exercised by 72 delegates or officeholders, but today there are only 8 of them. There has been a debate for several years about the delegates obtaining their personal incomes in the republic and autonomous province.

[Question] How much does the Yugoslav Assembly actually cost?

[Answer] In 1980 the Federal Assembly budgeted 354,694,628 dinars, and in 1981 it planned 368,049,444 dinars, or 4 percent more than a year previously. The Yugoslav Assembly covers its expenses from the federal budget. Over the first 9 months of last year expenditures amounted to 56,952,454.20 dinars, while expenditures in the first 9 months of this year were 56,982,907.05 dinars. These two last figures do not include money paid for personal incomes. Last year there was a saving of 21,080,036.75 dinars of the funds approved, which was returned. These are the results of the economy program which is being carried out painfully, but persistently.

Delegates and the Telephone

[Question] What expenditures are made for entertainment?

[Answer] In 1980 the Assembly budgeted 826,000 dinars for entertainment. That same amount has been planned for this year as well. Of that 597,602 dinars were spent last year, and in the first 9 months of this year 313,551 dinars. In accordance with the Law on Temporary Prohibition of Disposition of a Portion of Public Funds and Payment of Certain Expenses, one of which is entertainment--this, incidentally, being a law adopted by this Assembly--it is no longer spending funds for entertainment this year.

[Question] Certainly it would be interesting to know the amount of funds set aside to pay per diems of delegates.

[Answer] Over the first 10 months of last year 4,507,204 dinars were spent for per diems of delegates in both chambers and for operation of joint working bodies, while over the first 10 months of 1981 this expenditure was 4,099,488 dinars. The Federal Chamber's share of these figures was 2,442,954 dinars in the first 10 months of 1980 and 2,207,610 dinars in the same period of 1981. In the Chamber of Republics and Provinces 1,362,500 dinars were spent in the first 10 months of 1980 and 1,466,585 dinars in the same period of 1981.

[Question] The telephone is an extremely important device in the delegate system. It is quite certain that the delegates use it practically every moment. What are the telephone expenses like, how large are they, and who pays for them?

[Answer] Over the first 10 months of last year telephone expenses in the Federal Assembly amounted to 3,917,664.25 dinars, and this year 5,295,696.50 dinars, or 35 percent more than last year. This increase occurred partly because of the higher rates of PTT [postal, telegraph and telephone] services. Though constant warnings have been issued and a possibility has been sought for reducing these expenses, success has not been achieved. After all, all accredited newsmen have the right to report to their editorial offices on the proceedings of Assembly chambers and working bodies without any sort of compensation. And then the delegates and delegations are in constant communication with the assemblies of the republics and provinces, and the staff services of the Assembly must also coordinate their work with the respective staff services.

[Question] Have there been any disagreements with work organizations from which delegates have come? Do they seek compensation for the time which their people spend in the Yugoslav Assembly?

[Answer] It is an honor to be a delegate, and we have never had such problems, as far as I know. Performance of this task is an important social function. We have had only two cases in which work organizations have sought compensation for the days or hours which their workers spend in the Assembly as delegates.

[Question] In what republics or provinces are those organizations located?

[Answer] In Montenegro and Kosovo.

[Question] That means that we are not talking about the only two delegates who are peasants?

[Answer] No, they have not sought compensation. However, under a decision of the Administrative Commission of the SFRY Assembly, they receive 350 dinars for every day spent in meetings of working bodies or sessions of the chambers.

DUTCH REPORTER VIEWS ALBANIAN DOMESTIC SITUATION

Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 12 Dec 81 pp 21, 31

[Report by Frits Schaling: "Albania: Test-tube of the Revolution"]

[Text] A visit to distant (in all respects) Albania causes even a world-wise Western reporter to be perturbed.

Culture Shock is somewhat too big a word for his experiences. However, the inhabitants of Tirana made him feel like a medieval leper.

A travel report from the country where God -- as well as everything he forbade -- is taboo.

On foot, carrying a suitcase, I arrive that Monday morning at exactly 10 am on a different planet. The Yugoslav border officials look at me somewhat compassionately as I get out of the taxi which brought me from the Montenegrin capital Titograd to the border crossing near Shkoder lake, surrounded by grey mountains. As I walk the 200 meters between the Yugoslav and Albanian barriers there is complete silence, interrupted only by the chirping of sparrows which fly freely between the two countries.

An armed Albanian border guard patrolling in the no-man's-land doesn't react to my greeting, but in the distance an unarmed colleague appears, obviously knowledgeable about the fact that that morning at 10 am a Dutch journalist is arriving. He accompanies me to the border office, an immense space -- of the type I will still see numerous times in hotel lobbies, museum halls or cultural palaces -- where a bust of Enver Hoxha, surrounded by small palm trees, insures a sacred atmosphere.

The hall is filled with small tables and armchairs in lilac and pale orange covers. Along one of the walls, decorated in light blue and light green -- the pastel colors which appear to symbolize warmth, conviviality and prosperity in Albania -- there is a bookcase with translations of the recent works of the Albanian party leader. In the middle there is a showcase with the familiar knick-knacks that can be bought for foreign currency: handwoven purses, wood carvings, small copper cans, Albanian brandy and cigarets.

On the other wall the first slogan: "Even if we have to go without food, we Albanians will not disavow our principles, we will not be traitors to Marxism-Leninism." An hour later, when I have been handed over to the department chief of the Committee for Cultural and Friendly Foreign Relations who has just arrived, Albania opens itself up to me. A gate over the road, provided with screens to block the view, slowly moves aside and the harsh green Polish Fiat in which I am being transported can pass. An exercise in alienation, lasting many days, is starting.

Alienation because it seems that the categories in which the Westerner is accustomed to think are completely absent in Albania. The possibility to find out whether that is an optical illusion simply doesn't exist.

It isn't even exactly a culture shock which the Western visitor experiences in Albania. Despite the fact that the country was under the Ottoman domination for almost 5 centuries, it is unmistakenly Europe that one encounters: the citadel built three centuries before Christ -- before our era the Albanians prefer to say -- the magnificent cities of Berat and Gjirokaster, built against the mountains in the south; the remains of ancient cities and amphitheaters in Butrint and Durres on the coast. The history, the landscape, the people, everything is recognizably European.

Nevertheless, Albania is different and that realization often forces itself upon a person so overbearingly that it becomes almost oppressive. Various foreign visitors have compared the situation of a Westerner in Albania with that of a medieval leper who announced his arrival with a rattle.

When one walks through the streets of Tirana alone, without a guide, primarily one's shoes -- which Albanians immediately take for a sign of capitalism -- function as that rattle. From your shoes, the gaze of the Albanian passer-by goes to infinity; you have been classified and you continue on as a space traveller on a space walk. Foreigners who have been living in Albania for a while experience the same isolation. Their conversations with Albanians are limited to remarks on the weather; their social contacts take place exclusively within the small diplomatic community -- there are 16 embassies in Tirana, including the Greek, Italian, Turkish and French one -- and a Western diplomat characterizes the life of foreigners in Albania as "hell."

But is that true for Albanians themselves? After a centuries-long domination by the Turks and after having been the puppet of conflicts of interest between superpowers for decades, the Albanians, under the iron leadership of the communist party, started an experiment in 1944 which without exaggeration can be called the "revolution in a test-tube."

Utopia

Without making any concessions to the change in policy forced by practical considerations which brought the Soviet Union to de-Stalinization and China to rapprochement with the West, Enver Hoxha adhered to an orthodox explanation of the theory which according to Marx, Engels, Lenin and Stalin would lead to the one and only Utopia. Professor Zija Xholi, head of the department of philosophy of the University of Tirana, for example, says that "Comrade Hoxha proved that Lenin's principles are still valid and that Marxism as a philosophy can also be applied to modern times. The wealth of the bourgoisie still exists, only the contrasts have now been shifted to the difference between developed and underdeveloped countries. We can do nothing but continue to follow the principles of Marxism/Leninism."

Consistently sticking to the letter of Marxist evangelism, Albania thus grew into a pure communist culture where agriculture is almost totally collectivized, where religion no longer exists, at least not in any outward form, and where personal property is limited to a bicycle (costing about 1.5 times the monthly income), a watch, an alarm clock, a radio, sometimes a TV set, and some household appliances.

Albania is a country without a department of justice, because the administration of justice usually takes place at the lower levels; those who make mistakes are tried by the people around them. It is also the state where a new human being is originating who "works in the interest of society as if it were his own interest," as explained by a man who looks as if he just left the church council meeting of the Calvinist Bond in a Dutch hamlet. Depending on one's basic position, humanistic or materialistic, one can judge the results of the social experiment taking place in Albania as horrifying and insane, or as impressive and positive.

In comparision to the period before the second world war, when Albania was the poorest and most backward country of Europe, an astronomical progress has been achieved: the barely 10 percent of the mountainous country which was suitable for agriculture at that time has been doubled through drainage of swamps, irrigation, and terrassing of hills, so that now the country is able to feed itself.

The construction of continually more gigantic dams was coupled with the electrification of the most isolated hamlets, and the growing electricity surplus is being exported to countries such as Yugoslavia and Greece. Malaria and syphilis, the two diseases which 40 years ago still claimed the greatest number of victims, have been eliminated and the average lifespan of Albanians has risen from 38 to 68 years. "If we still had King Zog (who escaped the country in 1939 after the Italian invasion), that development would have taken us 350 years," says Jovan Vujoshi, the director of the polytechnic school in Shkoder.

Under Its Own Steam

Of course the Albanians are aware of the fact that their standard of living is still low compared to that of the Western world, but they console themselves with the thought that in a much greater number of countries in the world the development level is much lower. When they look at their neighboring country of Yugoslavia, they see that there are many more things for sale in the stores, but that, on the other hand, Yugoslavia has a debt of over 20 billion dollars.

"We know from experience that financial dependence also carries along political dependence," says the scientific secretary of the Albanian academy of sciences, Professor Luan Omari. Albania has laid down in its Constitution that the country does not accept loans, does not let in multinationals and does not enter into joint ventures. That is not due to xenophobia," says Professor Omari, "but due to our determination to stand on our own legs."

"We are building the 5-year plan under our own steam," one of the slogans around the Skenderbeg Square also vows. Skenderbeg, the legendary Albanian hero who succesfully defended himself against the Turks for several decades in the middle of the 15th century, offers inspiration from the past for the challenge of today taken on by the Albanians after the rupture with China. Skenderbeg is the symbol of pride and inflexibility whose cult almost matches that of Enver Hoxha.

Just as sacrosant is the plan which regulates not only the economy of the country, but also the life of every Albanian to the smallest detail. Experiments made about 10 years ago to decentralize the decision-making process a little were rapidly halted when it became clear that the greater freedom of local managers led to "voluntarism" and to the tendency of "technocrats" to want a more direct contact with the West.

Currently the centralized planning based in Tirana is all-powerful again: every contact with abroad has to go via the capital. Whether it is a matter of foreign books and magazines for the library of a small provincial town or the trip of members of the Greek minority in the south of the country to Athens, permission for that comes from Tirana, where such a request is judged on the needs embedded in the plan.

Levelling

Just as precisely calculated is the need of the country for university graduates. The universities are annually given an overview as to the number of graduates which have to be delivered by the various departments. Good students are assured of a job as a member of the cadre assigned to him by the state. Those who fail the exams have to be satisfied with a more modest job: instead of engineer in a factory, he becomes a foreman, for example. The financial differences are negligible: the highest salaries in Albania usually are no more than twice the minimum wage.

"We fight for a general improvement of the standard of living, but no single individual or group is allowed to become rich," says an Albanian discussion partner. That explains why private possession of automobiles won't exist for a while in Albania. That it might come about sometime in the future is not categorically excluded, but at this moment (thus argues the Albanian leadership) there are other priorities in the economy. The only people who have access to motorized private transportation are invalids who are allocated a three-wheeled vehicle by the state.

Aside from the loudly honking, often delapidated Eastern European trucks and buses, which Albania has also been producing since recently, the traffic in the capital of Tirana makes an almost dreamy impression. An amorous couple is strolling freely in the middle of the wide Stalin Boulevard, and a cyclist making a left turn all of a sudden brushes past without a sound. Also cars which turn a corner often don't bother to indicate direction. On the sparse country roads, pedestrians, horses-and-buggies, chickens and turkeys no longer have the place all to themselves, but car drivers are always responsible when something happens. Thus our chauffeur, who continually exceeds the 60 km per hour limit on country roads, remains very conscious of the fact that the small group of boys romping along the road a hundred meters ahead might all of a sudden dart onto the road.

"A country of contrasts," my guide smartly remarks when the car cautiously threads its way among the cows trudging on the road, while a truck is approaching from the other direction. Albania is not planning, however, to bridge those contrasts rapidly. Transportation is still taking place largely the same way it has been for a long time: with ox carts and characteristic horses-and-buggies with a sort of wooden "cabin" over the driver's seat.

Albanians utilize all sorts of means at their disposal even if they are old-fashioned or "unproductive." Productivity in any event is not a norm which plays a big role in Albania. Although government officials complain that productivity could be higher and that there is still too much "lack of discipline," they are not really worried about it. At the textile factory in Berat I get non-comprehending looks when I suggest that 6000 workers for this factory seems a lot to me in comparison to the production. "In the West," the sharp answer is, "one tries to get the highest possible production with the lowest possible number of people. Our principal concern is that people have work, not a maximum in productivity."

The national defense is just as tightly organized as the economy of the country. All Albanians, men and women, are subject to the draft to age 50. After 2 years of military training, everyone has to go for one month of refresher training every year. Under the slogan: "Albania lives in peace, but continually guards against attack" the country is strewn with mushroom-like small cement bunkers. No matter how dubious the effectiveness of those often not-too-solid appearing, covered pill-boxes may seem, they undoubtedly serve to strengthen the national self-confidence and feeling of solidarity of the Albanians.

Completing the blueprint for a communist society has made Albania the first atheist country in the world. Churches and mosques have been torn down or are being used as sport halls or storage spaces of movie halls, and only valuable cultural monuments have remained intact. The mosque of Berat, for example, looks like a mosque, but upon entering one finds out it is being used as a museum of architecture. Everything which reminds of the three religions of the country -- in the past, 70 percent of Albanians were muslim, 20 percent orthodox and 10 percent roman catholic -- has disappeared. Funerals have become an exclusively secular affair.

"Of course we cannot keep people from having religious thoughts," says the poet Pano Cuka, a member of the Greek minority, "but the new religion in our country is called 'Albanianism.'" The fact that candles are nevertheless burned on the graves of the deceased is not denied but is attributed to the fact that religion still influences the minds of older people.

Taboos

Is a "new human being" originating in Albania? That question is usually answered in the affirmative, whereby one gives as an example the enormous effort with which volunteers helped repair the damage caused by the earthquake in 1979 in the northern part of the country. But what is still voluntary in a country in which social control penetrates so deeply into the pores of human consciousness?

Society condemns everything in Albania which deviates from the norm established by the regime. Homosexuality, premarital sex, prostitution, pornography, pop music and other modern forms of expression of the Western culture are taboos. Those who sin against those norms can count on "correction" by society in the form of forced labor.

For the time being it does not look as if the careful opening made toward the West by Albania has led to the "degenerating phenomena" which the puritan leadership abhors so much. Albania has opened the door a crack, but the chain is still firmly attached.

CONSTRUCTION TROOPS CHIEF STRESSES SHORTCOMINGS

Sofia TRUDOVO DELO in Bulgarian 27 Nov 81 p 1

[Article by Lieutenant-General Vasil Vasilev, chief of construction troops: "The Quality of Construction Works Is an Inalienable Duty of Every Serviceman"]

[Text] The 12th congress of BCP has set before us the task to improve decisively the quality of construction work. Its effective realization depends not only on production-economic factors, technology and organization of construction, implementation of platoon organization and optimization of working processes, but also on a broad basis of moral, social and political problems. The Construction Troops have taken purposeful measures and achieved certain results in improvements of construction and installment activities. Quality is being viewed not only as a factor of great economic significance, but also as a factor which has tremendous social, ideological and political impact. There isn't a serviceman who fails to see clearly that we pay dearly for the existing shortcomings in our construction and installment activities.

We have talked for several years about restructuring our activity so that it meets the requirements of the new economic approach and its mechanisms, but in practice, some commanders continue to neglect quality. At many projects the prescribed technologies are violated, substandard materials are supplied, while poor care is taken of other materials. Still, after delivery of some construction project, work is required to eliminate some faults. Additional labor, materials and other resources are being used. All this causes losses to the country's economy. Such an approach, such an attitude in quality in the full implementation of the new economic mechanism would affect adversely the financial condition of the units as well as the material and social security of the servicemen.

Well organized, deeply meaningful and salutary labor is the most durable educational factor. The management of some projects, carried away by the fulfillment of economic indices and dealing with shortcomings, often neglects the compulsory technological sequence. We have to fight against such style of work. We have to realize that in the construction troops we have the responsible task to raise the technical culture and aesthetic taste of our soldiers. We are building thousands of apartments, hundreds of industrial and utility buildings which will satisfy the needs of the working population and will contribute to its aesthetic education for years to come.

The rapid and comprehensive implementation of scientific achievements and leading experience is of vital importance for the improvement of quality in construction activities. In this respect, a great deal has been done in the construction troops, but there is still some narrowness of goals in some organizations. Good plans are approved, many initiatives are fulfilled, successful technical projects and suggestions are made; machines, instruments and equipment with high productive parameters are shown at exhibitions of TNTM (Movement for Youth Technical and Scientific Creativity), but alarmingly little is done for their consequent implementation. How, then, are they going to be used in practice?

Despite the presence of the required number of engineers and technicians, we allow complex and requiring precision construction tasks to be executed in a primitive way, without the utilization of the necessary instruments and technique. At the same time we keep mechanized instruments and machines in the warehouse and remember them only at inventory time.

There is still a great deal to be desired in planning, studying, implementing and popularizing the positive experience in the struggle for quality. Within a unit, or even within a sub-unit, the positive experience of one team remains unknown to the others.

It is not accidental that a system of service and public organs for quality management was created in the construction troops. Their work is useful. When we evaluate their merits from the point of view of congressional decisions and normative documents and when we take into consideration the present condition of the quality in our construction projects, we will understand that there is much more room for improvement in this area.

The measures for re-training of engineers and technicians, and especially those of them directly involved in production, is insufficient. There are commanders and technicians who don't know well the novelties and requirements, are unable to work with measuring instruments, trust the master-builders too much and rely heavily on them, make gross errors, and show conciliatoriness and primitivism.

Formalism is allowed in the further training of rank-and-file soldiers. A great number of young people are still without special skills. The role of the master-builder is underestimated even if his work constitutes a considerable part of the working force. Highly rated specialists are rarely sent for training; there are almost no qualification courses for them.

The units seriously underestimate the public organs' work for quality. The created commissions sometimes exist only formally. Platoon councils intervene insufficiently; the servicemen community often remains indifferent to this problem. The daily control is neglected. The committees, commissions and groups for state and public control do not exhibit enough initiative for routine and surprise inspections.

Many of the good initiatives and suggestions remain only on p[illegible]r. For example, the Saratov system for flawless production is not popularized and implemented, the movement for personal quality stamp is neglected, as well as the issuing of warranty passports for the constructed apartments; forgotten too is the conducting of quality days etc.

We can say with certainty that the shortcomings and the unresolved quality problems in the construction activity are mainly subjective in character. Commanders, specialists, politorgans, party, trade union, and youth communist organizations have to exert a great deal of efforts to make their activity fully compatible with the requirements. At many places the commanding-organizational and party-political work for raising the cadres' responsibility for quality is not efficient enough. The violation of labor and technological discipline aggravates the quality of the construction work at some projects.

The development of a comprehensive system for management of quality should become our primary concern. Concrete measures should be taken for the creation of all necessary economic, technical, organizational and business preconditions for the improvement of our activity in this important index. We should begin from the Chief Administration of Construction Troops and reach down to the platoon level. Every serviceman should understand that the quality problem is of exceptional importance.

The comprehensive implementation of the requirements of the new economic mechanism, the introduction of platoon labor organization and platoon self-accounting will be a powerful factor for the successful fulfillment of the task for the improvement of quality and efficiency in construction work. The road to high quality has to pass through strengthening of labor, technological, financial and military discipline. Exactly this should be the inalienable responsibility of all commanders, specialists, party, trade union, and youth communist organizations.

Headquarters and the Political Administration believe that officers, specialists, foremen and soldiers will realize the importance of the issue and that the units will respond with concrete and effective deeds.

SHARP CRITICISM OF FILM INDUSTRY, TELEVISION VOICED

West German Commentary

Frankfurt/Main FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 19 Nov 81 p 7

['Ws' article, datelined Berlin, 18 November: "Too Reluctant to Broach the Socialist Way of Life--A Mechanic is Allowed to Criticize GDR Film Makers--Presentation of the Private 'Counterrevolutionary.'" A translation of the East Berlin NEUES DEUTSCHLAND article cited below follows this commentary]

[Text] In the GDR, the feature film production of the TV network and of DEFA, the republic's public motion picture company, has been subjected to sharp criticism. Apparently, it was in preparation for a discussion at the forthcoming plenary session of the SED Central Committee that on Tuesday [17 November 1981] NEUES DEUTSCHLAND, the SED's central party organ, published--in place of the customary commentary--a long letter to the editor entitled "A Reader's Expectations of DEFA and Television: 'What More I Would Like to See From Our Film Makers.'" In this unusual editorial of the party organ, Hubert Vater, chief mechanic at the Erfurt Kraftverkehr [Motor Transportation] VEB, stated he had the impression "that presently we are being offered a number of insignificant and boring films." He said he did not only mean various imported films "many of which I consider a waste of money," but also productions turned out by DEFA and television studios.

Vater pointed out that DEFA had established its reputation through militant films and that "the conscious advocacy of socialism" had always been apparent. But now, he said, it appeared there was a lack of films living up to the social requirement--formulated by Honecker at the 10th SED Congress--to the effect that socialist works of art should initiate public discussion concerning the intellectual requirements and moral value concepts of society. The chief mechanic stated that most films "say too little about us and our time. Where are the works of art that make us aware of the--let me say--titanic dimensions of the achievement that is reflected in the construction and development of our stable and flourishing workers' and farmers' state?"

The worker, who the SED organ turned into an editorialist, specified what films he would like to see. He wants films that "help to make political and moral decisions, that present us with experience distilled from the life of the people." As examples, he mentions the development of new large-scale and efficient production units, i.e. the combines, and the housing construction program. He accuses the film makers of being too timid in approaching socialist life. He conjectures that their difficulties may be due to their own insufficiencies, to "their dealing merely with insignificant little problems, their forgoing social impact"; or it might be due to the fact that they are not sufficiently encouraged to seek their subjects "not at the fringes, but at the center of events." Vater argues that in those places where the working class accomplishes its great achievements strong personalities are formed and tested; under such conditions, one has to show one's colors and prove through one's actions that one is true to one's socialist convictions. Vater states that he would like to see more frequently in films or on the TV screen individuals he regards as models. He feels that this is not asking too much.

GDR Mechanic's Criticism

East Berlin NEUES DEUTSCHLAND in German 17 Nov 81 p 2

[Lead article by Hubert Vater, master mechanic, VEB for Motor Traffic, Erfurt: "A Reader's Expectations of DEFA and Television: What More I Would Like to See From Our Film Makers"]

[Text] For some time, I have been asking myself whether I expect too much when I go to the movies and whether it is for this reason that I am disappointed at some films or whether my dissatisfaction is justified. Since 1970, some film-oriented colleagues at our transportation combine (I myself am a member of this group) have with their wives been attending the "Cinema Meetings" of Erfurt Bezirk's [GDR administrative unit] Film Administration. After the picture shows, we frequently engage in discussions in the cinema club, which maintains steady contact with us. So we have for some time been presented with the latest films. I have the impression--and other viewers share this view--that presently we are offered quite a few insignificant and boring films.

Here I am referring not only to some imported films, many of which I consider a waste of money, but also to productions of our own studios--both those of DEFA and of the television network.

The Contribution of Art Is Important and Unique

The DEFA established its reputation through films that move and impress one even today, 30 years later. At the time they were produced they were even more impressive. Imbued with great social commitment, they broached questions that at that time were of crucial importance to the people. A good illustration in this regard is the film "The Murderers Are Among Us," which was DEFA's very first feature film.

Whenever I hear the statement that art can make a very special, absolutely unique contribution to man's awareness, there immediately come to my mind the books, plays and DEFA films of those early years of antifascist-democratic reconstruction.

DEFA's militant tradition, its conscious advocacy of socialism was always apparent, even though in subsequent years not every film met the self-imposed high standards. For the sake of fairness, I must say that I considered excellent a number of recent films, e.g. "The Fiancee," "Ring-Doves Do Not Weep," and "Roof Over the Head." But as I said, it seems to me that the really good, interesting films, which after all should be full of suspense and entertaining as well, are too rare; I feel that their share of the total production--television included--should be greater.

Every Premiere Should Really Be an Event

The striving for efficiency, which determines our entire economic activity, should be applied to the realm of art as well. What do I mean by that? Well, we certainly do not have at our disposal an unlimited number of artistic talents. I am sure that in the field of film production, too, it is necessary to economize on material resources. So these resources should not be wasted on trifling projects. I am thinking here of films such as "Also-Ran or Victory," "Don't We Make a Nice Couple" and some other films I went to see. Should not the film makers do their utmost to make every one of their films a social event?

At the 10th SED Congress, Erich Honecker spoke of the "public discussion concerning the intellectual requirements and moral value concepts of our society," which discussion is supposed to be initiated by socialist works of art. Honecker explicitly included films and TV plays. I feel that a social requirement has been raised here and in my view the latest film production comprised too few films that meet this standard.

What Does the Viewer Learn About Us and Our Times?

I am no expert, even though I have always taken a special interest in films. So I do not know why our movie theaters show films that in my opinion leave the audience unmoved. In regard to subject matter and artistic expression, there is hardly a single film among those recently produced that I would call remarkable. Most of these films say too little about us and our time.

I feel these films take insufficient pride in the great achievements that the working class and its party--in collaboration with all the working people of our country--has accomplished in the last decades. Where are the works of art that make us aware of the--let me say--titanic dimensions of the achievement that is reflected in the construction and development of our stable and flourishing workers' and farmers' state? After all, we made great sacrifices in transforming this state from intellectual and material ruins, from hopelessness and lethargy into what it is today.

As I pointed out, I see too little of this. Or consider the present: Everywhere, there are significant social changes. Problems are arising that concern all of us. How can we solve these problems in a constructive way? Do we receive from our films experience distilled from the life of the people; do they help us to make the politically and morally correct decisions?

I would like to mention here the housing construction program. Is not this great social project--the past efforts at implementation and the consistency of our present, continuing efforts--a tremendous achievement? Even in highly developed capitalist industrialized countries, the program is held in high esteem--for obvious reasons: In these countries, social programs of this type could not even be considered, let alone launched. Instead, the workers are weighed down with more and more social burdens, in accordance with the motto: Missiles instead of butter! New apartments for worker families? Police truncheons for those who protest against capitalist rack rents. We have been witnessing all this in our immediate neighborhood, in West Berlin.

New Living Conditions Provide Topics

Housing construction program--that means new living conditions for millions of people; personality development for those who move into these apartments and also for those who build these apartments. Thousands of young people from all parts of our republic have come to Berlin, in order to build the new residential districts. How many life stories are bound up with this, how many personal conflicts, how much everyday heroism? During the recent Central Committee report of the young construction workers, we saw them, the competent boys in their work overalls. These are self-confident, free young workers, who deep down in their hearts, feel closely linked with their socialist state. Can one really say that this is no subject for our film makers?

The same goes for another significant social process: For the development of new large-scale and efficient production units, that is to say, our combines. These are socialist enterprises characterized by unprecedented material capacities. How much responsibility and decision-making initiative is concentrated in these combines? How are they utilized and are they utilized for the benefit of the people rather than for profit? And what problems are they confronted with? How much courage is needed for facing up to the requirements resulting from the scientific-technological revolution, from the developments in the world markets?

Why Approach the Human Condition So Timidly?

This and much more is part of our socialist life. Sometimes I have the impression that our film makers have not been very successful in this field. Their approach is overly timid. Perhaps it is due to their own insufficiencies, their lack of ambition, their dealing only with insignificant little problems, their forgoing social impact. But perhaps it is due to the fact that they are not sufficiently encouraged to seek their subjects not at the fringes, but at the center of events.

I am convinced that in those places where the working class accomplishes its great achievements strong personalities are formed and tested. It cannot be otherwise. Under such conditions, one must show one's colors; one must prove by one's actions that one is true to one's socialist convictions. I would like to see more frequently in films or on the TV screen such individuals whom I regard as models. I would like to get to know and share their concerns and joys; I would like to weep and laugh with them.

Is this asking too much? Are my expectations excessive?

OPERATION OF SPECIAL MILITARY TRAINS ANNOUNCED

Budapest NEPHADSEREG in Hungarian No 45, 7 Nov 81 p 11

[Article by Peter Buki: "Every Two Weeks: Special Military Trains"]

[Text] According to a notice sent to the troops by the Military Transport Main Directorate of the Hungarian People's Army special military trains will start a regular weekend schedule beginning 13 November 1981 for soldiers traveling on passes or leave. In the name of our interested readers we asked Captain Bela Petrak, chief of the transport department, for details about the new possibilities which will favorably influence trips home by soldiers.

[Question] What made it necessary to start the special military trains?

[Answer] The collective of the transportation service of the People's Army has been searching for years for a way to make it possible for soldiers going home or returning on weekends to travel more comfortably, under cultured circumstances and in a shorter time. By the fall of this year we succeeded in creating conditions which will ease the travel problems of soldiers and expand the care taken of them.

[Question] What are the new possibilities offered by the special train?

[Answer] The trains will start every two weeks--at the end of every second week--on Friday afternoon from two garrisons, from Lenti and Szombathely, with 11 and 9 passenger cars respectively. The two trains will unite at Celldomolk and will travel on with 20 passenger cars, touching at Gyor, Budapest, Szolnok and Nyiregyhaza, without transferring, to Miskolc, arriving there at dawn Saturday. According to our preliminary calculations this will substantially shorten travel time for many hundred young soldiers on these weekends so they can spend a larger part of their passes or leaves with their families, loved ones and friends. Only professional soldiers and draftees can travel on the train, with travel documents valid for second class on an express train. It should be noted that although the special train takes a roundabout route tickets must be exchanged for the shortest route according to the schedule of fares.

[Question] And the return?

[Answer] The special train starts back from Miskolc Sunday evening and takes the same route. The schedule guarantees that travelers will return relatively rested to their barracks before the start of Monday training.

[Question] And what do you expect from the travelers on the special military train?

[Answer] First of all that they will make use of this opportunity! They should be careful of the cleanliness of the cars, of the equipment and condition of them and of the health of each other. We are distributing questionnaires to the first travelers on the special train; filling these out in a precise and considered way will make it easier for us to take into consideration even better the interests of the traveling soldiers. We ask the commanders to make it possible for soldiers getting ready to travel to buy their tickets in advance--perhaps with the help of a fellow soldier designated for this purpose--so the travelers will not have to crowd around the ticket booth and worry about whether the train is coming. And we ask them to organize transportation to and from the train station for personnel traveling on the special train.

[Question] Is there a possibility you will increase the number of special military weekend trains or expand the routes?

[Answer] If experience justifies it we will modernize the schedule beginning next year, taking into consideration the needs. If possible we will increase the number of runs. Until then we wish the future travelers on the special military weekend trains good traveling and happy arrivals!

IMPORTANCE OF INDEPENDENT POLISH STATEHOOD STRESSED

Warsaw TRYBUNA LUDU in Polish 15 Dec 81 p 3

[Article by: Jerzy A. Salecki "Our Common Wealth And Only Hope"]

[Text] Attacks against the state were becoming increasingly numerous from month to month. Hundreds of strikes for any trifling reason, or no reason at all, senseless strikes, provoked by fervor, ill will, lack of imagination or even naivete were paralyzing the economy and increasing its problems.

Loud-mouthed demagogical propaganda of street slogans and mimeographed leaflets, playing up to the old traumas or emotions and ignorance, enhanced a mood of uncertainty, anxiety and confusion. Irresponsible pronouncements and threats formulated in the official declarations of so-called liberals fighting the "regime" helped multiply social divisions by counterposing citizens against one another.

The seemingly attractive, abundantly "democratic" concepts for the formation of new organs of society actually foreordained deprivation of the Sejm, people's councils, the government and the economic and local executive apparatus of their real authority. The massive assault on the structure of the state emboldened the riffraff of society, it fostered the concealment of inertia and indolence of ineffectual officials and promoted the widespread failure to enforce existing laws, to non-enforcement and the bypassing and violation of existing laws.

The Republic was threatened by a wave of anarchy. Instead of being genuinely self-governing--which is, after all, the essence of socialist democracy--it would have become a state of a thousand mini-parliaments, rather than the Sejm. It would have become a state of diverse clubs rather than people's councils accountable to the voters and having authority to govern but would have become a state of various confederacies, parties and associations whose common goal it was to weaken the socialist state. It would have given birth to a country torn apart by contradictions and by antagonistic cliques.

Could this have been consented to?

Consolidation of the state and establishment of conditions conductive to its power have been an unchanging canon of Polish political thinking. The memory of Mieszko I, Boleslaus the Brave and Boleslaus the Wrymouthed who, countering the feudal tradition, tried in a divided Poland to safeguard the country's unity through a seignorial principle or, at least, to lay a foundation for reunification at a later date). The memory of Ladislas the Ell and Casimir the Great are not merely the memories of their victories on the battlefields but also memories of their actions--total political, economic actions and decisions in the areas of culture and science which strengthened the underpinnings of Polish statehood and were essential for an independent motherland for Polish nations--a state with its own emblem and flag, its own laws and its own culture and educational system.

Outstanding thinkers of the past: Andrzej Frycz Modrzewski, Jan Ostrorog, Chancellor Zamoyski, Reverend Hugo Kollataj and the speaker of the Stanislaus Malachowski have all seen that a strong, law-abiding state to be the guarantor of national sovereignty and social development. They cautioned against blind self-interest and partisanship, against "the golden liberty" and against putting class or clan interests ahead of the national interests--Polish reason of the state which could be implemented only by a government controlled by the citizens, yet a strong government.

Throughout our thousand year history whenever society was torn apart by inner contradictions, feuds and strife, the state was weakened and reduced from an actor to puppet in the international arena. At all times, whenever the thesis state power was inconsistently implemented, society waned and rates of economic, social and cultural growth fell back.

Even at the times of most serious failure and defeat during a century and a half of enslavement the vision of statehood as a material symbol of independence gave impulse for action and struggle. What were the successive national uprisings--the Kosciuszko insurrection, the November 1831 and the January 1863 uprisings--if not armed upheavals meant to restore Polish statehood? What else, if not the striving to reinstitute the state motivated by the actions of a democratic nobility, various groups of the populist movement and, beginning in the last quarter of the 19th century, the programs and contests of a powerfully expanding worker movement? Their goal, always and invariably, has been the state--a Polish, independent state of all Poles.

The statehood concept and endeavor for the sake of a Polish state are, in fact, attest to our remembrance of nameless insurgents in the Wielkopolska uprising the Silesians who three times rose up in arms, the Kwiqtkowskis, Grabskis, and Swietoslawskis.

Although, as the poet said, there was a score of wrongs to be settled in the motherland, those laying down their lives in September 1939 to defend a Polish nation state, not a class state, were communists, socialists and populists who fought side by side with their political opponents to defend their own--yet at the same time common--state.

The state is neither a myth nor an embodiment of an ideal. It is simply the motherland defined by frontiers, laws, government and administration, symbols and social order. The state is a place on the globe that is recognized and guaranteed. The fact that so much blood had to be spilled by May 1945 in the fight for this place should make it even more precious and deserving of esteem.

Throughout 36 difficult years, we have all jointly been building a new independent Poland again, and new in its idea of social justice, its Piast-set boundaries, and its friendship and alliance with its neighbor--a world power guaranteeing our peaceful existence and survival between the Bug and the Odra [Oder] rivers. In the course of those 36 years socialism has become tantamount to the political awareness of an overwhelming majority of the Poles, a choice so much accepted and so deeply embedded in our thinking that everything that has been a distortion and sham of socialism encountered responses of protests and anger from millions of citizens.

These were not reactions against socialism or the socialist state. They were protests against errors made by people who wanted to use the red banner as a cover for their activities, and against a model of the clannish socialism" dominated by a chosen few who saw Leninist standards and socialist democracy as empty words and cliches.

After all, despite all the errors, distortions and even inequities, we have been jointly building up Poland, (we started building) a state that had been destroyed, that had no major industry and a--to this day neglected-- agricultural sector, we started rebuilding a culture and educational [system] that did not match the needs and aspirations of the nation. For 36 years, in toil and hardship often beyond measure and, at times, wasting our potential and resources, we, together, have been developing this state, our own Polish state. And, despite the crisis besetting us, despite the nationwide and personal problems, we need not be ashamed of the past years. That which has been done is what was possible, permitted by the possibilities and also--bluntly put--by the limitations of the leaders' economic and political horizons that let itself be felt.

The Polish socialist state is our common possession. It is our achievement and only hope. Thirty-six million citizens have no other place under the sun. Hence the overriding need these days for agreement consensus and unity despite variance, the ability to perceive fundamental goals while setting aside petty particular interests.

Our concern about the state and its present and future probably ranks with the anxieties of Zeromski who through his hero in SPRINGTIME demanded from the helmsmen of the Polish state to show the courage of a Lenin in dealing with the reforms that would render the independent state into a state of justice.

Today that justice is contained in the laws. It is our bounden duty to embody it in the formula for democracy and actualize it through work. The motherland is, in fact, a great collective obligation, wrote Cyprian Kamil Norwid, and in the words of the first president of reborn Poland, Gabriel Narutowicz the state is the sanctity of Polish survival and the Polish national flag.

These thoughts are worth holding in our minds and hearts precisely at this time. During these most difficult days.

EWA FIALA COMMENTARY ON 'STATE OF WAR' PROCLAMATION

PM231441 Warsaw TRYBUNA LUDU in Polish 15 Dec 81 p 1

[Report by Ewa Fiala: "A Burden That Will Bring Calm"]

[Text] On Sunday morning, many of us experienced a profound psychological shock. People at home listened over and cver again to the speech of the premier-general, to the announcements and resolutions of the Council of State, the proclamation of the Military Council for National Salvation [WRON] that had been formed during Saturday night and to communiques.

Until we actually went out into the street, came into contact with the town, reached our place of work, the internal instability was tremendous, overpowering. For no one--apart, perhaps, from experienced legal experts blessed, furthermore, with a vivid imagination--could appreciate the implications of what was happening. No one really knew what was, and would be our participation in the days to come.

"Curfew," silent telephone lines, severe, very severe sanctions--warnings of the consequences of transgressions, drastic restraints on liberties--all these are the realities of mid-December 1981. This burden and its accompanying inconveniences are tremendous. They will be the burden of every citizen. There is no reason to hide this, nor indeed any possibility of doing so.

However, it is necessary for each one of us to have a sincere and honest talk with oneself and answer a few of the most simple questions for oneself. Was there any other solution? Are the rigors that have been imposed upon us any harder to bear than the civil war we were on the brink of? Than the threat of bloodshed?

For it is not as though the conciliatory hand we have been extending these past months had turned into a clenched fist....It was that conciliatory hand (as the premier said) that met with a clenched fist, and could not break through the wall that was being constantly reinforced with unrest, with increasingly fierce conflicts, permanent protests, strikes, and the blocking of every initiative aimed at restoring calm and opening the way to leading the country out of the crisis.

At the moment, there is nothing in Poland now that we need more than calm and work. and that is by no means a contradiction. The state of war that has been declared should assure that for us.

It was against calm and against work that the "Solidarity" leadership proclaimed its resolutions in Radom and Gdansk. As if the 500 days from which each one of us had carried some unhappy news of a strike, a conflict, a street incident, of crimes, increasing with the wave of social unrest and growing anarchy, a new threat was being prepared for us. Rallies in the large city centers, a general strike, groups of 10 or 100 men leading "Solidarity" against the Party, against authority, against the Sejm, against the Polish constitution. Against People's Poland.

The hand of authority has not become a clenched fist. It has reached out to grasp the only, the last remaining rescue plank. A rescue for the Homeland. At such a time, difficulties and restrictions have to be borne. In such circumstances, one must not only have the awareness but also the assurance that the severe, extraordinary measures and sanctions do not apply to society, are not directed against the citizens, the trade unionists. They can affect only those who, aware of the goal for which they aimed, were the sowers of national unrest, were stirring up conflicts, and intended to start a fratricidal war.

Monday, the first day of the week under the state of war, so shocking and so difficult for many of us, certainly for very many of us, to accept, passed by quickly. There was no news that was too difficult to bear. The people, who have been entrusted with the maintenance of calm, and law and order in the country are equal to the task. Like soldiers, like Polish soldiers! Let us try to keep pace with them. We have a considerably easier task: to work and to remain calm.

WARSAW UNIVERSITY RECTOR INTERVIEWED

Krakow ZYCIE LITERACKIE in Polish 29 Nov 81 pp 1, 3

[Interview with Prof Dr Henryk Samsonowicz, rector of Warsaw University, by Jerzy Klechta: "What We Do Not Want -- the Nation Knows for Certain"; date and place not specified]

[Text] Jerzy Klechta: I would like to begin with the question of what would happen if here and now, under the circumstances in which our country now finds itself, a dictatorship government, let us say, would come to power. Assuming that this government would take the economy in hand and supply the shops with goods, would society today, after August [1980], accept such a solution?

Henryk Samsonowicz: The study of the future and the advancement of various hypotheses is always rather risky. But personally I am convinced that our society would not tolerate any form of dictatorship at this time. And for me the alternative is only the method of opposition to the dictatorship, that is, whether it is to be an active opposition or withdrawal into oneself. At the same time, I can guess why you asked the question. For it is a fact that as all possible sorts of opinions and trends are being revealed and given vent to, some populist tendencies, apparent in different groups, are also very strong. Perhaps even in the groups that are ostensibly more leftist, these tendencies are stronger. Ostensibly leftist... In other countries, as we know, this led to the worst consequences. It led to fascism and totalitarianism of the worst kind.

[Question] We hear and read that a year "after August" we find ourselves one step away from ruin. Could our inability be the result of a lack of consistency? What dangers...

[Answer] After the August explosion it developed that all of the forecasts, including the sociological forecasts, to say nothing of the economic ones, were erroneous. A society formed, or is forming, which none of the present standards and none of the present sociological models was able to foresee. A society whose dissimilarity from everything which had been in Poland is so obvious that it now evades all forecasts. This is occurring because new qualities are developing, both positive and negative values. But these new values have meant that almost all of the past knowledge about society has had to be scrapped. Very simply, what we have now cannot be compared with past events, either in the 19th or the 20th century. I believe that there can be no talk about a collapse; the results of what happened a year ago and during the past year are irreversible. Even if--in answer to your first question--someone were to come who would establish a dictatorship, he could not revoke not only certain institutional phenomena (for these are the easiest to revoke) but above all he could not change the social mentality, certain mental states which have already been developed and which exist at this time.

What is the danger? The very clear danger, of which all politicians must be aware, is society's tremendous weariness. Weariness under extremely difficult conditions, under living conditions that are very hard for families, for everyone. Weariness, however, is a very poor advisor. Weariness causes all sorts of tensions and nervous states which can lead to very dangerous effects. We must tell ourselves that we must do everything to avoid such false steps, but I do not believe it is possible to cancel everything which this past year gave to our society. No matter what may happen, these things are irrevocable.

As a historian, I will cite a very pessimistic example, but history, despite appearances, does not repeat itself. The May 3rd Constitution lasted a year; it functioned exactly a year and two months. The May 3rd Constitution fell, but, firstly, please realize what a tremendous role it played not during that year, for of course not much could be changed then, but during the next 20 years when it gave strength and hope and shaped the nation's mentality and made it possible to endure 150 years of subjugation. And during all the misfortunes that were connected with the lack of our own state. Secondly, the May 3rd Constitution, which changed a very bad political system at a very bad time, despite the fact that it was revoked by force, demonstrated some matters so clearly that the new Grodno constitutions had to adopt some of the ideas of this constitution. These constitutions were supposed to be a denial of the gains of the May 3rd law. Of course, they were a denial of the gains, but some of the ideas, as a matter of fact, had to be adopted. In short, there can be no return from certain events and some things..

I believe, however, that what occurs in Poland will depend on us alone. And the fact that all kinds of aspects of international politics and international economy come into play is, of course, obvious.

[Question] We are constantly seeking and elaborating on the truth, speaking the truth. There are people who say very unhesitatingly that we have cast aside the two or three faces which most people, in spite of themselves, showed: one face at home, and another at their jobs and among their colleagues. Is this true? What is the historical truth? In what way can it help the average person? Today we are dealing with a rebirth of the historical sciences. I know that my question is somewhat rhetorical, but nevertheless it is a fundamental question: What does historical truth give a person? Does it allow him to live better, with more dignity?

[Answer] Probably here we must clearly state what is history and what is historical truth. I understand historical truth to be a subjective, honest relationship to the examined past. For example, in writing about various problems from the 15th century I believe that I am making errors. However, my conscience is clear; I am acting in the best faith. If, under the influence of some kind of political circumstances I were to write a patent lie or a half-truth, then I would not be telling a historical truth, and this should be censured. Why does society need history?

Simply because society needs to be aware of itself, of its identity. A very broad identity. We are not a nation located only in space. We are a nation steeped in time. We want to identify ourselves and we are identifying ourselves. We are linked also with the great periods of our history--with the first Piasts, Poland's Golden Age, with moments that are full of glory, such as the aforementioned May 3rd Constitution and the rebuilding of the Polish state after the First World War. This, certainly, is ours. We are also linked with the tragic moments, such as the Polish September, the Warsaw Uprising and the entire resistance movement and many other difficult and dark pages of history. We need to identify ourselves because--and here we come to a certain misfortune connected with history--the false treatment of certain concepts of the nation have led to the growth of a feeling of shame for our past. And totally unnecessarily, for we have a great deal to be proud of, we have a beautiful history. Above all, we cannot instill into the beliefs of an adult or a child that whatever he does will always be wrong. That he should do something else, that precisely what he did not do is the greatest glory of his past life. We cannot tell him that he always had it bad and that in his home there were always only disturbances. And such a conception, very likely independent of the intentions of its creators, produced the worst possible results, for it brought the nation to a state of deep frustration. August 1980 freed millions of people of all sorts of complexes, including national ones.

During the last thousand years our achievements compared with the greatest world achievements in the field of construction of a social model, in economy, and even culture. Knowledge about this is the element for ridding ourselves of certain complexes. And here lies some danger, the danger of throwing the baby out with the bath water. That is, we are reluctant to speak about our various slips, shortcomings, errors. Although Pilsudski became a hero of the first order, no one even wants to hear about the fact that there was a Bereza [i.e., Bereza Kartuska], no one wants to hear about the Brest Fortress trial [i.e., 1931-1932 trial of accused Pilsudski opponents]. No one want to hear about the fact that the May upheaval was not a praiseworthy event. The upheaval was a negation of legality, about which we are now concerned. We are justifiably pointing to our greatness in the past centuries, but why, at the same time, do we not want to admit that we conducted, since the 17th century, a false nationalistic policy in the Ukraine. Some say that this would be to slander ourselves. This is not true. In order to know the truth about oneself one must know both his attributes as well as his faults. I agree that it is more pleasant to talk about the attributes, but unfortunately we must also remember the faults, both in the collective memory as well as the individual memory.

A person also needs a mental balance, which was absent because the official historical knowledge differed from that emanating from the home, from the traditions. A nationwide schizophrenia developed, a formation of an alter ego. As a result, the crisis of confidence deepened.

And of course this lack of confidence continues in us and weighs heavily on us. A phenomenon has appeared which we are now suffering with full effects, a bad phenomenon: that which does not agree with the required interpretation appears to be real. And this is just as serious a mistake and just as large a danger as the mistakes about which I spoke previously. Because the fact that the school textbooks on history between the two world wars were not good does not mean that all the textbooks were bad.

[Question] We are searching for our roots. We are seeking the truth so as to be able to draw a picture of the future. But does the nation with full certainty know where it is going? I am afraid that the future appears to be, to put it mildly, murky.

[Answer] Our nation does not have a clear vision of the future. It knows only what it wants. And it knows this only very generally. It knows that it wants the good things, like democracy, tolerance, lawfulness, and justice. But these are only very general slogans.

[Question] How are you able to bear everything that has been in a democratic manner placed on your shoulders? To be the rector of the largest and most important educational institution in Poland under circumstances of passionate ferment is an honor, but it is also a burden. The Polish intelligentsia of the late 20th century is being educated in this building. It will have to lift up this country, push it onto new tracks, change it.

[Answer] I must say that I make my life easier by dividing the responsibility fairly among my colleagues at the University. Furthermore, we began quite earlier at the University to search for better forms. We were probably 10 to 20 percent successful. But we do have here some definite results, some definitely tested forms of action. For example, the activities of the Senate and its commissions. Naturally, I must take responsibility for everything that happens here. I must sometimes make decisions without waiting to see what the University's public forum says. But please believe me, I do not feel alone because sometimes I simply accept, both for information purposes and for action, that which groups appointed for this purpose have decided. This does not mean that life here is easy and can be endured for long. Certainly not. Sometimes I am so tired that I do not have the strength to worry.

[Question] The last question. Assuming that there is no turning back from what happened in August 1980, what will we be like at the end of this century?

[Answer] Predictions for the future are not my strong point, although I can say how I would like it to be. I would like for our nation to create a model of action which would be the envy of everyone, both in the East and the West. I would like it to create forms of interpersonal contact which would be a model worthy of imitation. For envy does not exclude attempts at imitation. I would like us to combine everything which is good in our present system with everything that is good and just in the systems of other countries in the world, whether western or southern, or any others. I would like us to rise up and consider our history, our civilizational achievements, and consider our economic potential. For truly we are a country, a nation, that is wealthy.

DISCUSSION ON PREVENTING, COMBATTING CRIME CONTINUES

Bucharest ERA SOCIALISTA in Romanian No 20, 20 Oct 81 pp 14-17

[Article presenting letters to the editorial staff of ERA SOCIALISTA from Dr Constantin Iacovisac, Major Anghel Godeanu of the Ministry of the Interior, Gheorghe Barbulescu, president of the Sector No 1 Court in Bucharest, and Constantin Paunescu of the Institute of Pedagogical and Psychological Research: "Concepts and Practice in Preventing and Combatting Crime"]

[Text] Iacovisac: The discussion published in issue No 12/1981 of this magazine referred to problems of an especially current nature whose optimum resolution also depends to a great degree upon improvements in criminal legislation. The opinions expressed by the participants (it is good that in such discussions controversial points of view appear) open the possibilities for a broader dialogue.

As was also maintained in the discussion, it is necessary to have a differentiation in the punishments applied to minors according to the seriousness of the crimes committed and especially for very serious crimes, such as those against the lives of the people. I feel, however, that it is not necessary to reintroduce prison sentences for minors since, depending upon the gravity of the crime, the punishment could be ensured by maintaining the current educational measures (updated and improved with regards to the length of the measures as well as the manner of carrying them out).

In this regard, we could increase the length of the detention period according to the seriousness of the crime and the degree of the minor's social danger, organizing a system of reeducational institutes within which an institute could operate that has a stricter program. This option and the arguments for this solution are based upon the experience of applying prison sentences, a punishment which, in its content, could not be too greatly differentiated in comparison to the educational measure of interning minors in a special school, as well as upon the fact that special schools have those means of efficient influence that are capable of ensuring the social recuperation of minors, even those who have committed especially serious crimes.

The current special work and reeducational school for minors is based upon a regime of order and discipline within which the minors carry out productive activities, are trained in a skill and continue their obligatory 10 years of education. During school vacations, the minors do not leave the school, but rather carry out productive activities in the production workshops and at the annexed agricultural farm. In exceptional cases and only on the basis of certain special results in their work, education and discipline, minors are allowed to leave to spend a short period of time with their parents, with the provision that the family will provide appropriate educational conditions. It can be noted that in these circumstances no one can speak of internment in a special work and reeducation school as not being a measure that restricts a person's freedom.

We emphasize that even the current forms of the institution can be further improved, with the elaboration of new legislation being a good opportunity. For especially serious crimes, of the type referred to in the discussions by comrades Iulian Poenaru and Simona Petrovici, the maximum punishment of 5 years could be increased while in the case of the laws for executing these sentences there could be a provision for a differentiated and more severe means of carrying out these punishments. Clearly, in this situation it is necessary to have an administrative framework that will rigorously ensure this separation and differentiated treatment (something that currently is not being done), as well as a just individualized approach to the punishments given out.

The minors and young people interned in such recuperative institutes have great age differences (they could be 14 to 15 years old and could be as old as 22 to 23 years of age), they have a varied level of skills and education (some have only several years of school and are not skilled, while others are in stage I of high school and have a skill) and they were interned for serious, but extremely varied crimes (beginning with robberies that were committed a number of times or under violent circumstances up to rape and murder). Through the new regulations, we can create not just a single type of institute, but a system of institutes within which we will be able to achieve a differentiation in the reeducational treatment according to danger posed by the minor, his age, educational level and degree of recuperability of the minor. This system will be able to provide a much greater level of recuperability than minors' prisons or even the current institutions.

The experience accumulated to date and the studies that have been carried out over the years demonstrate that the phase of internment in a reeducational institute must obligatorily be followed and continued by the phase of socioprofessional reintegration after their release from the institute. This second phase must, however, be better organized than in the present. In this regard, the law on carrying out punishments should more clearly state not only the tasks and responsibilities of those responsible for the integration, but also the sanctions for those cases where they fail to adhere to the law.

Godeanu: In my opinion, the problem of reeducating criminals is a problem of great social optimism. The social task of reeducating criminals involves assuming certain greater responsibilities and - and why not? - even risks, sometimes feeding doubts and other times the hope that the person who has seriously violated society's values, the person who has offended us by his crime will someday be just like all other people who did not violate the law. Our criminal policy involves a special strategy and organization, calls upon the combined efforts of all of society and is based upon realism since the process of reeducation can not be achieved automatically by itself and it is not free of difficulties that can hamper, under certain conditions, the recuperation and resocialization of those persons who through their reprovable behavior attempt to avoid the efforts made by society.

The actions for reeducation and social reintegration are very difficult to achieve in practice, especially in cases of adult criminals and most of all repeaters. For that reason I think that the social effort regarding reeducation must be first of all directed towards the young people who committed crimes, up to 21 years of age, expressing a special concern that these people do not become hardened criminals. Being persons who are in the midst of development and having a high level of suggestibility, there are sufficient reasons for us to believe that up to this age the negative characteristics of their behavior can be corrected - as was also shown during the discussions - under conditions of an adequate reeducational treatment.

In the case of young people between the ages of 18 and 21 who are sentenced to prison terms, we have been experimenting since April 1978 with a specific system of reeducation, which cannot, however, "go beyond" the framework of the existing legal regulations. The main directions of this system were to acquiant the young person with work, order and discipline, to train him in a skill that can be used in the national economy, to help him to complete his studies in general education (primary, middle and high schools) and to help him to understand the opportunities that he has for reintegration into society after completing his sentence.

With the help of other authorities (enterprises, schools, inspectorates of the Ministry of Education and Training, and youth organizations), we have obtained some good results, but judging by the most valid indicator of efficiency - the prevention of repeat crimes - we cannot say we are satisfied.

A recent survey conducted in Bucharest with regards to the manner of socioprofessionally reintegrating young people who have been released told us that 70 percent no longer committed crimes (with a great number being employed in work and practicing the skills learned in prison). About 12 percent are known to have committed new crimes and the other 18 percent were not reflected in the survey since they had moved away from their known addresses and no information was available about them. Similarly, we noted that after their release (on conditions) from prison very few of those who benefitted from this act of clemency immediately got jobs (the majority of them showed up for employment after more than a month from the time of their release, giving diverse reasons, including the need for a period to "relax" after serving their sentence). Only a small number continued their studies in general education that were begun but not finished in prison and others "were travelling" without any purpose through various places.

The aspects shown by the survey implicitly lead to the conclusion that there is need to make improvements to the system of social control in the case of these young people. I think that we should not consider the reeducational process completed at the point when people are released from prison, just as, similarly, I think that there could be substantial improvements to the current regulations regarding the length of incarceration sentences given to young people up to age 21 who have committed crimes and to those dealing with the specific content of the sentence and release from prison.

Proposing reeducation as an objective means that we are proposing that the person who violated the law will firmly believe in this objective, which he will see as something that can be achieved in a useful period of time when life will still allow him to apply in practice the reeducation he received while serving his sentence.

The program for carrying out a prison sentence should be regulated in such a way so as to offer the possibility for the progressive transfer of the prisoner, in accordance with his receptiveness to the reeducation methods, from a program of severity to semi-guidance and supervised self-control. In this manner, we could shape three stages in which the prisoner would be placed in accordance with the progress that he shows. A first stage - of disciplining, professional training and completing general education studies - that would last at least one-third of the sentence; a second stage to which the young person would have access only if he gives sifficient proof that he is adapting to the requirements of collective work and the norms of behavior. This would consist of moving the young person into a system of work without being under guard where he could work in and improve his trade skills (even in the enterprise where it is foreseen that he will be employed in the future), but with his housing and educational program being continued in prison; the third stage, influenced by his corrent movement through the other two, would consist of the opportunity of transforming the remainder of the sentence (which would not be greater than one-fourth of the sentence) into a punishment that could be carried out under the supervision of the work collective, without depriving the person of his freedom, with this period continuing until the complete expiration of the initial sentence. It is understood that the failure to adhere to the required conditions during the last stage to lead to returning the person to prison where he would serve out his sentence, but under the program established for adults.

It would be especially necessary for the assignment of these people to work and their post-sentence assistance to be a major desire for all parties involved in order to increase the efficiency of resocialization actions. Similarly, we need to achieve a unified coordination of social reintegration actions and to broaden the framework of cooperation and information with the social authorities right from the point of carrying out the reeducation process and especially with the prisoner's former or future work collective members. In this manner, more persons will be involved in the reeducation process from outside the prison who can have a greater influence in guiding the prisoner.

Barbulescu: As someone who works in justice, I feel that the discussion published in the pages of this magazine raises some problems of a theoretical, but also practical nature whose resolution will contribute to a better and more unified application of the norms dealing with the punishment of antisocial deeds.

The experience to date has confirmed the justness of the decision that has allowed the process of reeducating people who have committed crimes and do not pose a high level of danger to society to be carried out, usually, without depriving them of their freedom under the supervision of work collectives in the socialist units and by carrying out a useful activity. The judges, the persons who pronouce the decisions on those who have committed crimes and other deeds dangerous to society, have the express obligation to go to the socialist units where those who have been sentenced are serving their terms. On these occasions, we judges realized that some collectives that have been tasked with the supervision of convicted persons too easily give up when faced with a "resistance" on the part of some of these convicts and are "disarmed" by the rebuff of those who refuse to work and carry out their tasks and who repeatedly miss work, continuing to exhibit antisocial behavior and committing reprovable deeds. I am convinced that some collectives for guidance and reeducation confined themselves merely to making formal observations on such recalcitrant persons and to measures lacking any educational or even coercive efficiency, and limit themselves too quickly and easily to requesting a cancellation of the punishment.

At the same time, the on-the-scene analysis that we have conducted show that some members of the guidance and reeducation collectives do not understand the normative acts and especially Law No 23/1969 regarding the carrying out of sentences, and as a result are not capable of adopting those legal methods necessary to appropriately organize the activities for supervising and guiding convicted persons. The elimination of this shortcoming could be accomplished by a thorough preparation and training of those persons (and even the heads of the units) called upon to carry out the functions of social reeducation and recuperation in the middle of the collective.

Similarly, a better cooperation is necessary between the organs of justice, the prosecutor's office, the militia and the heads of the enterprises where persons are assigned to serve their sentences on-the-job. Practice shows that each of these organs is limited to fulfilling its own program for following up on the way the sentence is being served within the collective without being involved in bringing together the activities and actions undertaken at the level of the courts, the prosecutor's office and the militia sections. Because of a lack of coordination and operative information on the part of certain units where these convicted persons are located, it is not always possible to maintain a clear record on the process of reeducating and resocializing these convicts, with "the alarm" to the legal organs or to those of public order coming too late in such cases and with those who were withdrawn from supervision being listed as "disappeared" from their place of domicile.

The exigencies of a legal and efficient recuperative activity require the people working in justice, the militia and the prosecutor's office to demonstrate much more firmness with regards to persons who commit acts of social parasitism and to ensure the trial of these persons in the presence of a broad public audience. The experience of conducting on-the-scene trials attests to the overwhelming influence of the collective upon the guilty parties, contributing at the same time to the creation of a powerful current of opinion supporting the prevention of antisocial acts and deeds and against those who would be "tempted" to set out on the path of crime.

It should be stressed that in those units where there is a powerful collective and a climate of order and discipline the reeducation process evolves positively and the convicts are integrated into social affairs after they serve their sentences, with some remaining in the collective in which they were assigned after the completion of their sentences. In this regard we should give as examples the workers collectives at C.A.T.C Jilava and Group 5 Worksite in Bucharest where, as a result of permanent supervision and persevering concern for the reeducation of convicts, good results were obtained in social recuperation actions.

I differ from the point of view expressed in the discussion by Simona Petrovici in the sense that for especially serious crimes minors should be sanctioned in such a manner so as to provide an appropriate punishment that will go beyond the limits to which they can currently be sanctioned. Actually, an appropriate punishment for an extremely high level of social danger in some of the crimes committed by minors requires the imposing of certain punishments that deprive them of their freedom when they committ especially serious crimes (crimes of violence and so forth). I have this opinion since the step of internment of certain minors, as applied today, does not correspond to the serious social danger of certain crimes that have been committed (many of these minors are close to 18 years of age). At the same time, the deprivation of freedom would have a greater preventative effect.

Paunescu: I feel that the discussion raises some essential problems for understanding the spirit and the meaning of our criminal policy. Actually, the main problems were discussed in a realistic manner regarding the problems confronting those who apply the laws or contribute to the prevention of antisocial acts.

Since psychologists have special tasks from this point of view, I would like to refer to a problem revealed in the discussions with the participants: the relationship between the prevention of "latent delinquency" and the attitudes of expectancy expressed by some educators, social organs and so forth, with regards to the commission of antisocial acts.

It is known that antisocial manifestations constitute a serious perturbation in a person's mechanism for integrating with others. Can they be foreseen and, on this basis, be prevented before they are committed? This question is essential for any legal system, for any society. If the answer to this question is affirmative, a second question is immediately shaped: What methods do we adopt and which specialists do we call upon? The answer comes just as quickly: educators, psychologists, doctors, lawyers and sociologists. Their methods will be based upon understanding reality and the factors that determine or favor antisocial behavior. Can they be identified, mastered and neutralized?

For example, the urban environment is considered by specialists, under certain conditions, a factor favoring criminal behavior. Thus, for example, in some very congested areas of large cities there are records of problems of adapting to school and problems of behavior. An appropriate response to this, however, has not been formulated. On the contrary, as was pointed out by comrade Nicolae Dan during the discussions, some teaching faculty sometimes confine themselves to the formal "transmission" of a school program in a non-attractive, non-pedogogical manner, frequently stressing the cases of informational supersaturation to the detriment of civic education and the creation of civilized behavior. Such a "didactic activity" sometimes produces stress effects which, when added to other factors favoring deviant behavior, such as a lack of control and a permanent education guidance in the family, school dissatisfaction, involvement in negative street groups, a disorderly life and so forth, is expressed in non-participation in learning, including in learning and mastering certain moral-social values. These students adopt a rebellious attitude and an avoidance of groups.

On the basis of certain deficiencies in family education and the influence of the corrupt street environment, can this social attitude perhaps constitute a factor favoring illicit behavior? The answer is yes. This is due to the "escape" of the "problem" student from the attention of the educational organs, the rejection of social integration actions by those having reprovable behaviors and a lack of concern on the part of certain educational authorities (teachers, professors, youth organizations) for combining the educational program with a substantial program for education and for uncovering and treating the cases where there is a failure to adopt to school and civic affairs. In some schools, I encountered students exhibiting signs of maladjustment - under some conditions the starting point towards criminal behavior. Their precarious school situation, the discord in the families from which they come and their critical mental health status were known, but neither the professors nor the doctors had taken the measures that they needed.

Through this passivity, was "the opening" perhaps not made easier towards criminality? Is not the recovery of a minor or a young criminal made perhaps more difficult to obtain than the reintegration of one who merely exhibits criminal tendencies? These are the questions that specialists frequently encounter, but unfortunately only after the commission of a serious antisocial act.

In this regard, it is understood that the prevention of dangerous violations plays a decisive role. It is even more necessary since "the special cases" are known. In this context, I agree with the point of view expressed in the discussions that the efficiency of prevention requires firm, effective actions and the renunciation of types of ideas like "let's wait and see if the minor straightens himself out." Such an expectational approach is still encountered in some schools or work collectives. It consists of tolerating certain antisocial behaviors and a climate of a lack of discipline and disorder. To know that someone has deviant tendencies and to do nothing to prevent them, waiting for the commission of a crime and only after that to began using the mechanisms of correction, can perhaps be the greatest mistake of an educator, but this mistake is many times "committed." Frequently, it is expressed through a lack of responsibility on the educator's part, the family and so forth towards "the little antisocial outbursts."

The discovery, prevention and neutralization of what is called "latent delinquency" are the forms of the efficiency of social education actions that involve the cooperation of all the factors (doctors, psychologists, lawyers and so forth) and the scientific organization of an integrated system of prevention and reeducation. Through the operational and actual convergence of all of these factors we can ensure a multilateral and efficient prevention of antisocial manifestations among the ranks of the minors. Otherwise, the concept and practice of decriminalization can be compromised, remaining simple theoretical desiderata.

SUCCESSES, SHORTCOMINGS OF FILM INDUSTRY REVIEWED

Bucharest ERA SOCIALISTA in Romanian No 20, 20 Oct 81 pp 22-25

[Article by Calin Caliman: "The Romanian Film Industry in Search of a Personality"]

[Text] Despite all the differences of opinion noted, the recent discussions regarding the present and the future of the national film industry, which involves the artists, the audiences and the critics, have a "common denominator:" the desire to contribute in one way or another to the qualitative growth of the production of films according to the importance of the social-political and cultural-educational functions of cinematography in the overall group of complex concerns in creating an advanced socialist awareness, according to the importance of the film industry's responsibilities to the realities of contemporary Romania, according to the demands of a public that has naturally progressive exigencies and - why not? - according to the creative aspirations themselves of certain artists who have more than once given proof of certain superior artistic abilities. The personality of the Romanian film industry has over the years outlined its own defining characteristics (this is a piece of evidence that is beyond any discussion) and specific traits, as shown by certain timeless, durable works, recording the moments of a "spiraling" value growth with remarkable artistic highpoints. On the other hand, qualitative oscillations, contradictory arguments or even contrary arguments (detectable without too great a difficulty in the repertoire of each stage of the film industry) have hampered the stabilization of an overall picture, sometimes leaving the impression that the lines and shades of colors of this "portrait" tend to run together, to mix among themselves and to... be contradictory in a confusing drawing.

Naturally, each year of the film industry has had and will have those films that are better and poorer, it can be no other way. No film industry anywhere in the world was built only on great works. Yes, it can even be said that the outstanding artistic works of the international film industry - works that were never accidental - sometimes had long periods of accumulating various experiences. And, all the true schools of film making in the world have known how to maintain their position by consolidating the essential gains in experience. Any discussion of the Romanian film industry, I believe, must begin from this point and end up here: at the consolidation of the "principal fund" of films, authors, ideas and means of expression capable of representing authentic characteristics of the personality and at the avoidance of thematic, artistic and organizational errors that can fog the overall picture and disrupt the mechanism of creative work.

Thus, from the beginning the discussion of the basic problem of the contemporary Romanian film industry, the revealing of certain not only useful, but necessary lessons for the evolving perspective and the expected and desired qualitative leap forward cannot make abstracts of the arguments on the history of our film industry. The common duty of the artists, the critics and the spectators is to participate in the building of the desired film industry, not merely to comment on it "from afar" or sometimes with undeserved applause (for... two "bricks," let us say, narratively correctly placed one next to the other) or equally improper acidic remarks frequently made without understanding the cause or guided not by constructive purposes but by destructive ones (this sometimes still happens). The participation of this community in the creative efforts (which can be done in all kinds of ways) requires a good basic understanding of the entire creative path covered by the Romanian film industry so as not to start over and over again at "zero" in attempts at certain outstanding artistic performances and so as to use efficiently in the future the positive experiences of the past and the present.

Better than 3 decades have passed since the first production of our socialist film industry, the film by the producer Paul Calinescu, "The Valley Rings." This film marked, at the beginning of the 1950's, the inauguration of a new creative path for an old art form (even back then) going back decades, but one which could only record a very slow evolution because of certain difficult material and spiritual conditions or purely and simply stood still despite certain brave pioneers. It is not at all an accidental fact that this first film of the new Romanian film industry abandoned the realm of this plateau in order to penetrate into the center of realities, attempting to bring to life the pulse and rhythm of work in the first worksites in socialist Romania. Despite its naivete (sometimes beautiful, other times flagrant), this film with the "wrinkles" of a nonetheless revolutionary artistic time has, in a practical sense, an orientational function (which, it sometimes happens, we forget) for the evolution of national production: it shows the first (and basic, I would say) meaning of the socialist production of films and it inaugurates a course upon which nearly all the later creations of our film industry would be recorded, with artistic results that are more or less important. It is the "lesson" for the basis of films in reality and of the inspiration of life. A lesson that by definition is a participative one that stands at the basis of a number of successes on the honor roll of the Romanian film industry and it should not be forgotten for a second. It is also absolutely necessary to be continually adapted to the requirements of a constantly evolving reality.

This upward path was influenced by appearance and affirmation of a certain film industry personality that contributed decisively to the imposition and consolidation of an originality in Romanian films. We once again go back many years, but it cannot be done otherwise, to look at the masterpiece by the uncontested "master" of Romanian film comedy, Jean Georgescu, whose "Stormy Night" (inspired by Caragiale) remains a true model of creative screen work. Let us also remember the distinguished man of culture and education, Victor Iliu, and his films, especially "The Lucky Mill" with its remarkable qualities of ambiance, art and psychological analysis which have become a precious "object for study" for all the craftsmen of the seventh art form. Through a film of high civic and esthetic value such as "Woods of the Hanged," the producer Liviu Ciulei provided a major inspiration for the Romanian film industry, that of integrating the youngest art form into the area of effective expressions of the national culture. Then it was the turn of a Lucian Pintilie. Among his films, with deep reflections regarding the human condition in the contemporary world, "Reconstruction" remains one of the most significant and powerful films inspired by real life. Leaping over certain periods, let us stop at one of the youngest creative personalities, the producer Mircea Daneliuc, whose films demonstrate a powerful sense of observation in seeking reality and an active, firm and lucid attitude in commenting on the facts of life on the screen.

Between these chronological "extremes" there are numerous valued producers from different generations having distinct personalities in the overall scope of national production: Mircea Saucan and Iulian Mihu, Ion Popescu Gopo and Sergiu Nicolaescu, Malvina Ursianu and Lucian Bratu, Manole Marcus and Andrei Blaier, Mircea Veroiu and Dan Pita and other producers about whom we will have something to say in this article.

Why is it necessary for us to continually go over the personalities of the Romanian film industry? (We have mentioned several producers, but each creative "chapter" without a doubt has its own noted personalities, from the writers and renown cameramen to the broad "front" of certain first-class actors.) We have to because any film industry that is respected has to learn to cultivate its personality as is appropriate. All the great film industries in the world know this lesson well; the Romanian film industry still sometimes forgets this.

And, the personality of a film industry does not in a practical sense (merely) mean "the sum of creative personalities." Similarly, it is also determined by the constants having a defining nature in the creative process itself. Along this line of thinking, one of the most specific characteristics of the national film industry is, I believe, the affirmative and constructive nature of the sociopolitical and cultural-educational approach. Both through the prism of the thematic choices and in the selection of the specific film methods, our film makers in their representative works have tried to address the present and the future with the arguments of their times, offering precious "documents" about their eras and about the significant events that occurred on the level of consciousness. As a logical consequence, the political vocation of our film industry was gradually consolidated during the achievements of recent years with films like: "The Power and the Truth" by Manole Marcus, with a screen play by Titus Popovici, and "The Moment" by Gh. Vitanidis, with the screen play by Dinu Sararu - stimulating discussions regarding the qualitative changes that have occurred in the awareness of contemporary man and regarding the key problem of social responsibility, as pursued over an entire stage in the contemporary history of Romania. Through these types of films, the Romanian film industry becomes not just a witness, but an active participant in the development of contemporary society. By adding the representative force of the incursions into daily life and the prospective capacity in investigating reality (with both of these being consolidated in the production of films of current interest in recent years) and by once again stressing the permanent desire of having the specific national aspect in film making, we have before us several of the constants of the most precious content of the Romanian films produced throughout the years. "The lessons" of these constants? The renunciation of them (especially... involuntarily) has led more than once to mediocre films that are of low civic and artistic interest, poor in substance and incapable of addressing contemporary times at the height of their real problems of life, events and feelings.

Therefore, we arrive at the main "test" of film making (of any film making): the film of current relevancy. The interest of the film makers (and the film studios) to discuss the problems of contemporary reality has increased during the recent period: this fact is also beyond any question, with the film of current relevancy practically becoming the "center of gravity" of each production year. The question, however, that is urgently asked beyond those quantitative aspects of the creative work is that regarding the educational-esthetic quality: Do Romanian films appropriately respond to the requirements of the complex process of creating and developing socialist awareness? As we will see, despite all the successes there are still large shortcomings - social-political and cultural-educational - in Romanian films with regards to reality, to the essential aspects of the multilateral and complex process of building socialism in Romania and to the problems of the life, work, events and feelings of contemporary man.

Before, however, analyzing these "shortcomings" (I would not call them "failures") of our national film production, that have practically maintained a state of dissatisfaction around the Romanian film industry over the years and not necessarily "the saint of creative dissatisfaction" that is constantly needed, let us bring into this discussion several arguments regarding improvements which, as we were saying, the film makers must keep in mind in their future attempts: they are "hurdles" under which they should no longer have to go, they are hurdles that must be overcome. Among the films of current relevancy from the mid-1970's, for example, there are several that undoubtedly consolidated the ethical and esthetic approach of our film industry: first, Mircea Daneliuc's "The Race," a sensitive and nuanced analysis of certain different worlds of contemporary thought and feelings; then, "Philip the Good," by Dan Pita which closely examined the destiny of a young man, a significant destiny for the dialectics of the changes in the awareness that have occurred in our times; Andrei Blaier's "Illustrated With Field Flowers," a film that dealt with the problem of moral responsibility with nerve and realistic verve, through the prism of one case; other films of the 1970's, such as Alexandru Tatos' "Red Apples," Malvina Ursianu's "The Passes of Love," Mircea Dragan's "Explosion," Serban Creanga's "The Owners," Timotei Ursu's "September," and Lucian Bratu's "The City Seen From Above." Even if, in part, they did not all succeed in convincing everyone, together they have an undoubted significance in consolidating the Romanian film of current relevancy and in opening certain new paths for the future. Portraits specific to the present and contemporary psychology, actions bearing the stamp of the times in which we live, problems resulting from the new social realities and relationships that are still being affirmed and furthered, questions from today's young people - all these film making contributions have considerably broadened the palette of the film dealing with currently relevant subjects. "The lesson" of these films should not be ignored either: without the "spirit of life" no film industry can discover and suggest its own identity and social-political, civic and esthetic appearance.

Actually, we can state without fear of error, even if not in a direct and explicit manner (but the idea of an "unseen hand," which is not at all new, is part of the dialectics of progress!), that "the lesson" of such films, as corroborated by the lessons of certain older films such as Mircea Saucan's "Meanderings," Lucian Bratu's "A Film With a Charming Girl" and Savel Stiopul's "The Last Night of Childhood," was brought to fruition during the evolutionary spiral of our film industry.

Actually, the 1980 film making year can be considered one of the most fertile years (I am personally inclined to even call it the most fertile) in the entire short history of the Romanian film industry. There has even been talk of a "qualitative modification of our film making landscape" - and I think rightly so. For a number of reasons I think that the creative experience of 1980 (which in itself also constitutes a "lesson") must be well analyzed and used most efficiently in future film making years and, implicitly, in the future evolutionary stages of the national film industry. We say this for a number of reasons. First, because it was not completely accepted and brought into awareness (of the public, the critics, the producers, the authorities responsible for disseminating Romanian films throughout the country and abroad, and even the artists themselves). Then, because this experience incorporates - voluntarily or involuntarily, I do not know - several of the main experiences accumulated over the years, in a practical sense closing out a stage of Romanian film making that coincides with the end of the eighth decade. Finally, because it constitutes from a thematic and stylistic point of view, if we are permitted to use this disjunction, a good "point of departure" in the general (perhaps even general?) effort to obtain a new, superior film making quality. When we say "film making quality," we are naturally thinking, moreover, of the political, social, moral, philosophical and esthetic quality of the approach to films.

Thus, 1980, an outstanding year for the national film industry, should not be viewed "in itself" as a rare and fortuitous example, but it must be viewed through the prism of its contacts, some of which were especially significant. Is it perhaps an accidental fact that precisely at the moment when national production grew within 1 year as much as in 10 it should coincide with "the outstanding year" of our film industry? No way. The task of rapidly increasing the number of films, which the party secretary general, comrade Nicolae Ceausescu, asked the film industry to do as a basis for improving the quality and degree of originality of our national production, where the personality of each quthor could find its own distinct point of expression for satisfying certain higher exigencies, this task of high political and cultural-educational responsibility fulfilled by the film makers at the end of the last five year plan fully confirms by way of the practical results obtained the justness of the policy to qualitatively renew our film industry.

We should not at all ignore the fact that in a single film making year several films of current relevancy having large ethical and esthetic echoes were produced, such as Mircea Daneliuc's "Microphone Test" (a producer who, with this film of great sincerity having pertinent observations about life, has unleashed a true "battle of the natural" which our entire film making industry must win), Lucian Bratu's "Bride on the Train" with a screen play by D. R. Popescu (a film having profound ethical implications whose poetic realism sometimes becomes engrossing), Iosif Demain's "A Girl's Tear" with the screen play by Petre Salcudeanu (in which the authors take a careful moral x-ray of the contemporary village, exploring the mentalities and attitudes that can facilitate and maintain ethical deviations and reprovable deeds) and an entire series of other films, like "Stop - Personnel at Lunch," "House Between the Fields," "Good Evening, Irina," "Peasant at the Opening," which broadened through the power of creative thought the palette of those films of current relevancy, pointing out problems in the life of today's young people or sanctioning the evil in people. Nor should we ignore the fact that in a single film making year our national film industry's heritage was enriched by a film of profound partiotic resonance - "Burebista" by the writer Mihnea Gheorghiu and the producer Gh. Vitanidis - or by a film of faultless cultural and esthetic content like Malvina Ursianu's "The Return of Voda Lapusneanu," in addition to other legendary pages such as "At the Crossroads of Great Storms" and "The Mountains in Flames" (the 1848 revolution as recalled by the writer Petre Salcudeanu and the producer Mircea Moldovan) or "The Stake and the Flame" (by Adrian Petringenaru, based on the homonymous novel by Eugen Uricaru).

Continuing along this line, nor should we ignore the appearance during a single film making year of two exceptional stylistic achievements - "The Pale Light of Pain" by Iulian Mihu (with the screen play by George Macovescu), a film recognized at the Moscow Film Festival, and "The Wolf Hunter" by Mircea Daneliuc (based on the novel by Dinu Sararu, "Some Peasants") - films "of art" having relevant political implications and a clear creative originality. Nor should we ignore the fact that in a single year the Romanian film industry gave the audiences of the silver screen certain far-reaching literary works such as "Ion" by Liviu Rebreanu (adapted for the screen by Petre Salcudeanu) in Mircea Muresan's films "Curse of the Land" and "Curse of Love" or "Poor Ioanide" by G. Calinescu (adapted for the screen by Eugen Barbu) in the movie version by Dan Pita, to which we could also add the films "The Last Night of Love..." by Sergiu Nicolaescu (a nonetheless "too liberal" adaptation according to Camil Petrescu) and "Loving Anastasia Passed By" by Al. Tatos (based on the homonymous novel by D. R. Popescu). Let us also mention several films "of the public" such as "Highway of Bones" (by Doru Nastase) and "The Artist, the Dollars and the Transylvanians" (by Mircea Veroiu), created at a meritorious professional level. Let us also note that a film like "The Labyrinth" (by Serban Creanga) that in other years would have undoubtedly been among the top "honors" but in the "context of 1980" it risks being left out.

It is necessary to make some summaries and draw some conclusions. The overall repertoire of 1980 presented itself (by itself) through its cultural content and through the diversity of its creative activities. The "ethical temperature" of the films of current relevancy went up, as did their effect on attitudes. The creative effort was more than once accompanied by distinct efforts to improve the films produced on an artistic level. The young artists had a broader field for their activities, which they brought to fruition with the power of young thinking... All these things are signs that we are engaged in a change of structure, especially in the concept and evolution of the film dealing with currently relevant events.

In recent years, however, in the film industry (thus, we are expanding the bounds of "the outstanding year") there also were a sufficient number of films of "current relevancy" that clouded and are still clouding, as we noted at the beginning, the overall picture of the Romanian film industry. The causes differ from one case to another, but after we uncover several of them perhaps we will "find" several common (perhaps lost!) causes.

Why did the film industry not attain, except to a very small degree, its goals in making a film having a generous theme, such as "Investigation," for example, which aimed at discussing the implications of a work accident? The answer seems simple to us: because the center of interest of this investigation was moved from the necessary and complex human implications of the conflict towards a restrictive, technical problem, thus becoming a "discourse"... a discursive approach, losing sight of the specific nature of the film itself, not only as art, but also as a type. Moving on. Did not the film "Cumpana" perhaps move a possible drama (having ethical implications) away from reality? I think so, with the main cause being the excessive number of atemporal elements. Can a film like "The Morgan Girl" be convincing? A beautiful picture and song (in parentheses it should be said "improper") does not make it: reality is ignored by all types of artificial and even false "details about life."

Why does a melodrama like "A Song for My Son" have a reduced ethical and artistic level? Because it tries (in vain) to cram a "story about life," life itself, into a sketch, relating serious events in a jocular tone. Let us be well understood: it is very difficult to be convincing while speaking in a comic tone about a serious judicial error, an exclusion from the party, an unfounded detention, a fatal work accident, an orphaned child and a suicide. "The Third Fatal Leap" is perhaps a leap into the void of improbability. The story of certain young people at a large worksite in "Gliding" is filled with many unnatural accents in the people's manner of speaking and in their evolution. And, in the film "The Gates of Morning," a film inspired by the unusual realities of the world of fishermen, are not the lines of the conflict perhaps very "exaggerated" (until they are sometimes wiped out)?

And so forth. The examples could go on for a long time, right up to the present... Beyond identifying these "particular" causes, we can uncover several main (chronic) dificiencies which in a practical sense determine the destiny of many non-representative films. In many of the films of current relevancy, there continues to be (we are not the first to say so or for the first time) a still very narrow perspective among those in the business, and especially the writers, regarding contemporary realities: cute, luke-warm conflicts are called upon (hopelessly) to give the films the necessary fuel; aspects of too little significance for the present are called upon to speak about the rhythms of the events and feelings of our times; many new structural traits of the contemporary man have not made it to the screen; and descriptivism, schematicism and narrowmindedness continue to place their stamp on many (too many) Romanian films. The cause beyond all the causes, the "cause of the causes," is frequently identified with the lowered self-exigency of the authors - the writers, the directors and so forth - and the reduced exigency of the producers.

The "lesson" in this case among other films, and there are not too many, is offered by Mircea Daneliuc's "The Cruise," one of the few creations that continues the "powerful line" of 1980, giving it a thematic acuity and a demonstrative eloquence. "The Cruise" becomes an argument: the chance to defeat time, to convince and to provide emotions cannot but smile on those films about attitudes that succeed in leading life towards events of art, culture and education through the filter of artistic thought and personality. Why doesn't a film like David Reu's "Personal Problems" (achieved on the basis of the valuable screen play by Grigore Zane) move towards superior artistic results? Perhaps because it is sometimes lacking the "feeling of proportions" and the "feeling of degrees"... What about Virgil Calotescu's "Ana and the Thief" (with a screen play by Francisc Munteanu)? Perhaps because it presents nothing more than the unwinding of a story... It is a decisive thing; in many of our films (even in the case of certain works of imagination and artistic virtuosity such as, for example, "Luchian" the film by the producer Nicolae Margineanu), the meditative and reflexive capacity leaves much to be desired, hampering as such the fulfillment of the political substance without which our films cannot be seen as being from a time of impressive spiritual and material changes.

Without a doubt, in the equation of the development of the Romanian film industry not just the artists and producers have an important role, not just the distributors (I repeat: in-country and abroad). The public and the critics play an important role. The Romanian film industry has good, stimulating and... patient audiences. There are seven million spectators each year at Romanian films, which is a beautiful performance. On the other hand, a fact that came out this summer at the Film Festival for Youth (an excellent initiative that was itself stimulating) is capable of provoking thought: in the discussions around the film "The Cruise," many of the young participants who saw the film were left talking about and confined to the story itself and did not succeed in going beyond this, towards the significant layers of the film. For the cinemagraphic culture of the audiences, especially the young people, more must be done: in order to go beyond the current evolutionary stage, the Romanian film industry needs an ever greater number of well-prepared spectators.

All these demands also require a reevaluation of criticism, in accordance with the current stage of the evolution of the Romanian national film industry. This industry is no longer a weak organism incapable of advancing without the "crutch" of critical encouragement, but, on the contrary, through the most representative works of recent years it has acquired an ideal and artistic vigor and marked personality traits that have lead it and must lead it towards the ability to accept and seek out the critical truth for a more rigorous determination of "its own awareness." That is why there is further need for a deep and substantial criticism that is attentive both to the ideas and the structure of the overall body of films and to the specific techniques that will place the accent on the content of the works being discussed without absolving it for the sake of "good intentions" and the quality of the art form. Certainly, there is not "ideal criticism" that will please everyone. But, there is a talented and responsible criticism that makes an effort to convince the greatest number of readers by using arguments. Respect for the profession and the persons under discussion is a moral imperative that is among the most important ones, as well as that of renouncing the comfortable aspects and favors of certain circumstances. The mechanism of criticism is not always spared such distortions which are unfavorable to a cinemagraphic record of far-reaching philosophical, moral and esthetic impact that will respond to the essential desired qualities of criticism: principledness, objectivity and combativeness.

The communist reponsibility of the Romanian film industry - to reality, to the audiences and to the specific problems of our times - is constantly broader and more profound. The new quality of the Romanian film industry must from desires become deeds. This cannot be achieved except by learning the lessons of the past and having clear insights into the future in order to be able to give ethical and esthetic consistency to the films inspired by the socialist present and the near or distant past of our country and the Romanian lands. To understand well and thoroughly the constructive sense of life and the aspirations of the people and to give to this sense an ever more convincing esthetic expression through the modern means of the art of film, in ever more attractive and diverse forms having a content of ideas that is constantly richer and more original - this is the supreme responsibility of our film industry in the immediate and distant future of the coming years.

TRAVEL RESTRICTIONS FOR ALBANIA--A 10 December 1981 decision by the FEC (Federal Executive Council) amends a 27 November 1979 decision which permitted travel to countries with which Yugoslavia has diplomatic or consular relations even if these countries have not concluded agreements with the SFRY on eliminating the visa requirement. The amendment says that this stipulation does not pertain to travel by Yugoslav citizens to Albania. [Summary] [Belgrade SLUZBENI LIST SFRJ in Serbo-Croatian No 68, 18 Dec 81 p 1747]

SENTENCED FOR HOSTILE PROPAGANDA--Yesterday the criminal council of the Sarajevo district court sentenced Hidajet (Metina) Krasnici (1960), a student from the village of Ljesane near Pec but residing in Sarajevo, to 3 and 1/2 years in prison for hostile propaganda based on Article 133, paragraph 1 of the SFRY Criminal Code. On the basis of letters he sent from Sarajevo, a diary which he kept, conversations with various people, and a tape recording, it was established that Krasnici had committed the act of which he was accused, from April to the end of June 1981 following the counter-revolutionary events in Kosovo. Acting from positions of Albanian nationalism, he called for a change in the socialist self-management system, the dissolution of brotherhood and unity, and described the sociopolitical conditions in our country in an untrue and malicious way. FRENCH SOURCE ON POSSIBLE CONSEQUENCES OF SHEHU DEATH

Paris LE FIGARO in French 21 Dec 81 p 6

[Article by correspondent in Athens, Jean Delamotte: "Uncertainty for Albania--The Heir to Enver Hoxha Commits Suicide"]

[Excerpts] On Friday morning Albanian Prime Minister Mehmet Shehu took his own life during a "spell of nerves." A personal friend of the head of state, Enver Hoxha everything seemed to indicate that he would succeed him when Hoxha gave up his position. Fate decided otherwise. Mehmet Shehu, who was the father of two children, shot himself in the head. People who had seen him the night before said that nothing gave any signs of "the tragic event of the next morning." This man who presented the 7th five-year economic plan (1982-1987) during the 8th party congress [in November 1981] was physically and, especially, morally tired. The latent crisis with Yugoslavia in regard to the Albanians living in Kosovo, combined with the isolation from the world which Albania has known after the break with the Soviet Union and later China, seem to have played a determining role in the action of Mehmet Shehu.

In power since 1954, the Albanian prime minister worked in closest collaboration with Enver Hoxha, the first secretary of the party, and often helped him in carrying out his foreign policy. The brutal death of this man, who was operated on in Paris in 1972, in the strictest secrecy, poses a serious problem for Enver Hoxha. The latter, not departing from his Stalinist lets everyone think that the succession to Mehmet Shehu will be settled in the current Politburo of the party. The Politburo has a definite majority of former collaborators of the Albanian premier.

The sudden death of the number two Albanian poses serious questions for the most expert observers. Was it really a case of death occurring as a result of a spell of nerves, caused by a gradual lassitude, aggravated by an accumulation of major problems for Albania? Everything leads one to believe that this was the case. The spell of nerves seems, indeed, to have been caused by physical weakness. His worries and perhaps even poor health sapped his strength. Unless this "spell" might have been due to personal matters. But that seems less probable.

Note: In a communique published after the death of the Albanian premier, the Union of Albanian Nationalists in Europe states that "the death of the initiator of purges, of torture camps and of religious persecutions marks the beginning of the intensification of the active struggle of the Albanian people to regain their individual rights and freedoms."

CONSUMERISM: ITS CORRUPTIVE EFFECT WITHIN SYSTEM

Sofia FILOSOFSKA MISUL in Bulgarian No 11, 1981 pp 3-10

[Article by Nikola Nikolov, candidate of philosophical science and Partizdat chief philosophy editor: "Letter to My Contemporary"]

[Text] Time goes by, our hair is turning gray and white, as we frequently continue to wander around in the area of abstract concepts. "So what," you may object, "inertia is a powerful force." No, my friend, I disagree. Whether we realize it or not, this "inertia" has its specific scientific name: social position! It develops slowly and imperceptibly, the way a rock pushed by the current eventually changes its shape. The hierarchical position, size and means of earning of our income have the strongest influence on the thoughts and feelings of a person, on his entire life. This is something which neither science nor literature ignores when they deal with the individual.

You cannot fail to be impressed by the actions of today's educator. He mounts his attacks against us every day and has become so impressed by the power of the word (spoken or written) that he considers it as just about the only means through which we can change the human mind and develop in the people a Marxist-Leninist outlook. Apparently, he ignores the time in which we live. He does not realize in the least that once, under different circumstances, when reality could only be criticized and when there was no opportunity for making ideals part of life, the power of the word was indeed the most important means of revolutionizing the consciousness of the masses. Today, when we can implement the communist ideal step by step, whatever their power, words lose their meaning and become strongly depreciated if they are not always backed by practical action, by the personal refusal of a material benefit or the elimination of one or another privilege.

Do you remember, my friend, the first years after 9 September? At that time we lined up for a piece of cloth or fabric. Even the black bread was rationed. We did not even know the meanings of words such as washing machine, refrigerator or television set, not to mention private car, cottage or apartment. However, can we forget the enthusiasm which stemmed directly from our young freedom? Do you remember the songs at the brigade projects of Khainboaz, Dimitrovgrad and Pernik-Voluek? Do you remember the purity of our relations and how imminent the advent of universal social justice seemed! Our major problem then was to heal the severe wounds caused by the war and to socialize productive capital in industry and agriculture, and no more! That was to be the beginning of our broad way leading to fraternity and equality....

More than 35 years have gone by since. Productive capital has long become public property and we are surrounded by things about which we could only dream in the past: apartments, cottages, cars, television sets, refrigerators and washing machines. All of this has become reality, a profound part of our daily lives. However, despite this material well-being, the alarming question weighs on us: have we taken a decisive step forward in our moral relations as well?

My friend, how did it happen that for many people that thrust toward equality was converted into a desire for the accumulation of property? It is as though the question of an increasingly equitable distribution of goods was left somewhere behind and that our days began to be filled with endless conversations about the cottage, the car, the apartment, the children's studies, the frequency and place of our trips abroad, and the objects with which we have surrounded ourselves. Imperceptibly, property is "softening up" our brains. It could eliminate boundaries between different principles. Some fighters for equality have imperceptibly begun to turn into moralizers who are looking for reasons for the excessive pursuit of material goods by individuals in their "low consciousness," and are trying to resolve the major problem of restraining our acquisitiveness with the help of educational blabberings. They seem to be totally unaware of their profound self-contradiction when they express their support of the fact that human nature is the sum total of social relations and ties while continuing most zealously to ascribe to education some kind of miraculous power which could change the individual radically without, however, changing the relations and ties which are the fabric of the personality. This applies mainly to ownership relations in which we become firmly involved from birth, since the right to inherit stamps even the babies with the seal of ownership! Moralizing, which is attempting to replace the study of ownership relations with "simple matters of conscience and statements on justice," using "the entire heavy artillery of moral indignation" (Marx) is of absolutely no help.

My friend, I am sure that you will agree that as time goes on there is an increasing number of unresolved problems. One of them is that of consumerism, which is increasingly starting out as problem No 1, a problem whose resolution will determine our future steps toward completing the building of mature socialism. This is because consumerism affects most strongly the economic foundation of the new social system and opens a painful wound. As consumerism blossoms the aspiration toward bright ideals wanes. This is the alarm signal which calls for making a most thorough roll call in the ranks of the fighters for real socialism and communism.

Slowly but surely consumerism implants its own criterion of man, measuring him by the yardstick of his position and property. Accumulated money does not stand still, it wants to show off but not in its natural aspect, for all money looks alike, but in the guise of expensive and very expensive objects, from a ring to a luxurious cottage and splendid apartment, the type of car, television or refrigerator we have, fashion, household furnishings, the food we consume, etc. The intimate world of man becomes strongly and directly tied to his possessions, which leave a profound mark on his spiritual world and overall thinking, feelings and behavior. The property itself is an attitude displayed by the individual toward others in terms of material objects. It is precisely this "mine-yours" relationship that links individuals within a common chain of steps and actions, and at the same time, leaves deep marks in their souls, alienating them and pitting them one against the other.

Anywhere you look, in plains and mountains, ravines and rocks--you come across cottage areas. Should we ask ourselves the question of why we build a strong fence and a two- or three-story cottage in which we spend one or two days a week? How effective is this? What large amounts of materials, some of them expensive, are used, how much furniture is purchased only to remain locked for almost a full year, while elsewhere a hospital, a school or a kindergarten will remain unfinished and while some people are short of housing! To top it all, should owners of cottages have the right to use public rest homes?

You know, my friend, that there are things which could be passed over in silence without, however, becoming any less harmful. Has anyone failed to see the way consumerism destroys healthy human virtues by replacing them with gross practicalism embodied in the animation of objects? The person who has fallen into this muddy stream enjoys his acquisitions, touches them and melts in their sight as though they were living. He is ready to discuss any one of his objects hours on end! Friendship, comradeship, love, family, science and politics are all, in his view, subordinate to "money." His entire life consists of an uninterrupted calculation related to his benefits, while the interests of the collective and society are ignored. It was no accident that Marx said: "I laugh at so-called 'practical' people and at their wisdom. Naturally, if a person wants to turn into an animal, he can turn his back on the pains of mankind and show concern for his own skin."

Such a person does not stop at anything for the sake of wealth. The deformed feeling of "this is mine" is indifferent to the destiny of other people the way money is indifferent to the goods that are purchased with it--bread, poison, a palace or a hut. Such a person does not consider the hurt dignity of an honest man; his conscience remains mute as he faces his father, mother or sister at their dying hour, waiting impatiently to inherit; nor does he stop at even the most disgusting deals which may even include murder, for the sake of getting money, for "money is the basis of all secrets," as Balzac's characters frequently exclaim. Describing such a consumer, Gor'kiy categorically states: "He is always greedy and afraid. He can turn a toothache into a global event; all that matters to this parasite is the 'I.'"

Something else is striking: the maneuvering for positions and titles which bring material benefits greatly suppresses the individual, darkens his bright aspirations, destroys many people spiritually and corrupts some young people as well. Such people, who have committed themselves to the struggle for an actually illusory glory, avoid any serious discussion of important social problems and consider critical remarks as attacks of a personal nature. Such ego-blindness prevents them from being in step with real life.

Needs excite our passions and increase our wish to own one object or another. However, what does to own mean? Does it correspond to the real needs of a person today? No, for frequently these are two entirely different things. Possession means to take over something as "my property." Whether or not this is needed, to what extent is it needed, or is it owned only for impressing others, i.e., for the sake of prestige? In many cases it is precisely the latter that applies. "At a certain level of wealth," Count Monte Cristo, Dumas' character, used to say, "only that which is unnecessary becomes necessary." Such an acquisition of goods which deprives others who truly need them is not found in the animal world, it is the offspring of human society....

Once it has appeared, ownership soon proves to be a reliable and irreplaceable tool which some people use to dominate and exploit others. Some begin to live in palaces while others find themselves in huts, and hungry, although it is precisely they who build the palaces and produce all goods. It is thus that, having crossed the threshold of civilization, human history becomes marked by the shameful seal of slavery: slaves and slaveowners, serfs and feudal lords, hired workers and capitalists--all of human history is imbued with such forms of suppression of humanity. What is even more paradoxical is that the curtain has not been dropped and that the tragicomedy goes on. The rich class today has concentrated unparalleled power in its hands--science, technology and manpower to which it throws the pitiful remnants of the lord's table along with an abundance of lies about freedom and equality for all, spouted day and night by the mass information media it controls--the press, radio and television. On top of all this, it has secured for itself a tremendous military might which can destroy even life on earth....

By consumerism we do mean in the least any kind of insatiable gluttony for food or any innate feeling of prestige acquired through the self-seeking accumulation of objects. Such biologizing of consumerism merely distracts our attention from its true nature and from the search for its deeper causes. Without this, however, we cannot engage in any kind of successful effort to limit and eliminate it. Consumerism is a social phenomenon. Its manifestation is possible only within society as a relation between people based mainly on material goods.

According to some, consumerism consists of object-mania; others reduce it to sponging, the result of innate laziness; others again blame poor family upbringing.

All of these explanations of consumerism contain a certain amount of truth. They consider one or another external feature, something which can be easily noticed. However, we know quite well that frequently phenomena may be misleading, for they do not entirely coincide with their real essence. For example, the most widespread opinion on the nature of capital is that it represents objects--machines, factories and other objects. Some people have gone so far as to describe as capital the stick held by a savage who uses it to defend himself from wild animals or to pick fruit. However, the systematic application of Marx' scientific approach clearly indicates that capital is not an object but a social relation, a historically developed production relation between the private owners of productive capital and hired workers without property of their own.

The very essence of consumerism is the use of someone else's labor without reciprocating, i.e., social parasitism. The question may be asked: is this not in fact sponging by another name? My answer is no, this is not a play on words. Looking at it more profoundly we will note a very substantial difference. For example, everyone knows that a member of a family may become a sponger. However, if this happens to be one of the spouses or a child, and the sponging is entirely at the expense of income earned honestly by the family, we are not dealing with true consumerism as a social phenomenon. In this case it is that specific family that has been hurt. The fact that society has not entirely applied the socialist principle of mandatory work by everyone who can work is a different matter.

That is why this type of sponging, although bordering on consumerism, is still not real consumerism. As a social phenomenon, real consumerism begins as of this point, when objective real opportunities arise for a person to obtain as personal property mainly material goods without having earned them. Yet this is precisely what political economy describes as the acquisition of someone else's labor without equivalent exchange.

It is at this point that we must look for the line that divides sponging within a family and consumerism as a social phenomenon. The former does not encroach upon public property. It is parasitism within the family, affecting its members. The latter is based entirely on public property and is parasitism at the expense of society. Actually, it means going beyond the framework of normal consumption in the sense that the individual does not limit himself to the necessary means for subsistence, bearing in mind the actual possibilities of production forces for the satisfaction of the needs of all members of society. His credo is the accumulation of surpluses, naturally at the expense of the deprivation of others. However, what criterion do we use in determining whether a given income has been actually earned or represents the acquisition of someone else's nonequivalent labor? It is not a question of income acquired illegally such as through theft, fraud, other criminal actions, etc. It is a question of legitimately obtained income which has been earned neither partially nor entirely. What do we mean by this? Of late, we have witnessed the appearance of various positions such as deputies, assistants, consultants and secretaries of directors in excessive numbers and who may be doing all the work of their superiors. Inflated tables of organization may be found at all levels of the administrative apparatus. Thus, sometimes entire salaries are earned without work, or else only part of the salary has been actually earned. From the viewpoint of the characterization of consumerism, it becomes very important to find a proper criterion when we are faced with the actual payment of unearned high rather than low wages. In the first case, such undeserved earning make an easy life possible, even bordering on luxury, whereas in the second such funds may be insufficient to meet even normal needs.

Once Balzac raised the following great question: "What would become of our society if we were to engage in tracing the origin of all wealth?" Naturally, this applies to the bourgeois society. However, because of the inevitable existence of commodity-monetary relations in our socialist society, the secret of the amount of the income remains as a burden, although to a rather limited extent, affecting mostly the additional income such as fees, illegal acquisition, black market deals, etc. Exchange among private individuals can make a great difference in the income and is almost totally impossible to control. Although partial, the secret of the amount of income creates a serious problem in terms of public morality in a society such as ours, for it conflicts with its basic principle according to which no one must live at the expense of someone else and that work is the prime obligation and honor of everyone. In this respect, the existing method for informing the respective commissions of cases of unearned income is ineffective. "People begin to keep secrets," Hertzen wrote, "when their moral life breaks down; they are afraid of acknowledging this breakdown and hold on to the form with trembling hands, ignoring the essence; they cover their wounds with rags as if wounds could heal when they are concealed." Since we keep track of the amount and nature of the work of everyone, it is entirely logical and mandatory to know precisely how much the income is and how it is earned and consumed. Lenin expressed this idea most categorically as follows: until we reach the "higher" state of communism, "the strictest control will have to be maintained on the part of society and the state concerning the amount of labor and consumption." People who have honestly earned their income cannot conceal its size. The party appeal to everyone to earn his wage mandatorily stipulates that the income of everyone is disclosed, for wherever there is a secret related to the income, there may be a guilty conscience. This leads to undesirable consequences in terms of public morality, the more so since today we have reached the stage of building mature socialism as an approach to the transition to the higher phase of communism, for which reason we must carefully see to it that disparities in living standards are reduced.

More than 2 centuries ago Jean-Jacques Rousseau wrote that all members of a society would live better if no one had something unnecessary. Baboeuf described this idea as the "elixir," and made it the essence of his book "The Social Contract." Marx exclaimed that this was "remarkable!" However, its implementation does not mean a war against objects which are naively proclaimed to be our "tyrants," "enslavers," etc. Consciously or subconsciously, things are blamed as the "culprits" for consumerism, because of lack of knowledge of the problem. This is an error. However, sometimes it is also an attempt to mislead others in the interest of those who have acquired considerable wealth.

A long time ago Marx gave a scientific answer to the question of who is the "culprit" for consumerism: possession. It turns objects into commodities, it allows a person to acquire one or another object or service, it dispenses justice, it does not hesitate to make some people slaves (overtly or covertly), something which is continuing to this day; it proclaims man as something less valuable than an object, sets brother against brother or son against father and mother in mortal combat. All of us know that objects are something dead, mute; however, they begin to "talk" in all languages the moment we "include" them in ownership relations. The model of car or television, the price of a cottage or a gilded lamp, seem to take a life of their own and "speak" about their owner, simply characterizing his position in the hierarchy of owners. The person complacently exhibits them, projecting the silent idea that "look, this is me!" An object as such has nothing mysterious about it, Marx wrote. However, the moment an object becomes a commodity "it immediately becomes something sensory, supersensory. It not only stands firmly on its own feet but in terms of all other commodities, assumes the leadership and grows in its wooden head insects which are far stranger than if that object were to leap into a dance by itself." The entire mystery of the commodity aspect of the product is found in the fact that the equivalence of various types of labor on the marketplace takes place through the accidental purchase and sale, for no plan is made in advance as to who will produce what, how much and when. Therefore, the individual goes to the market with a great number of doubts as to whether he will sell or buy what he wants. Naturally, at this point he gets the idea that "God only knows what will happen!" Yes, but God is far away in heaven while down here on earth it is money that sits on its throne, for money has the miraculous property of being traded for all kinds of objects, it can open doors like a magician and, generally speaking, if enough money is available, a feeling of lordship is developed.

This precisely is the reason for the fact that relations among people assume the phantasmagoric aspect of relations among objects. In the midst of this entire chaos money is singled out as the "royal commodity," surrounded by total secrecy and ascribed supernatural qualities. The most terrible crimes against mankind have been and are still being committed for the sake of owning more money, i.e., becoming socially more powerful. We do not know whether he was joking or serious when G. Flaubert wrote to G. Sand: "Oh yes! I would be ready to follow you to another planet, for money will soon make our planet uninhabitable." Today the stockpiled superweapons present the real threat that Flaubert's statement may prove to be true....

When we think of crimes committed throughout the ages, slavery, egotism and greedy aspirations for reciprocal plunder, unparalleled self-destruction in wars, we cannot avoid the thought that it is as though people were given a mind for the sake of living as stupidly as possible. My friend, I did not invent this, and it was quite well expressed by Robert Owen: "As long as the human mind does not reject the deception related to this mad puzzle about money, the people will be unable to think and act as sensible beings and the world will be nothing but a tremendous madhouse, constantly shaken up by anarchy and disturbances, in which every person will oppose those around him openly or secretly, although being truly and sincerely united should be the supreme and permanent interest of everyone."

You and I, my friend, know that under our circumstances public ownership and economic planning greatly restrict the market element and debunk the godliness of money. This is a big truth and thanks to it we are greatly superior to the exploiting society. However, it is paralleled by yet another truth: as long as commodity-monetary relations exist and individuals become owners, to a certain extent the element of market relations and veneration for money remain. No one even dreams of promoting the cult of money which comes from birth. This is a minor truth on the basis of which consumerism grows. It is a real opiate without which one could do. However, once tempted, a little will no longer do and the perpetual motion machine gets into action. You may find it strange, but it is a fact that even "Secondary Raw Materials" has joined in the rush for public funds and big money....

My friend, have we become excessively soft in resisting the pressure of possessions? To this day I wonder how it happened that barbed wire fences have been built in mountains. Will this symbol of "my property," which is letting blood from the body of nature every day and which can no longer conceal the theft of public property worth millions and millions of leva, continue to exacerbate the open wounds in the heart with the claim that this is almost communism? Somewhere two or three apartments exist "hidden" from the law; somewhere else an entire area of summer homes appears "illegally," and is then easily legitimized; elsewhere again public funds amounting to tens of thousands of leva are borrowed for a short time. Meanwhile, the controlling authorities get short of breath in their efforts to extinguish these flames of ownership.

"What do you say, is it not natural for a person to acquire a few more possessions in order to live a somewhat better life?" True, you are right. But look at it this way: does the tragedy not begin precisely when a person obtains something? Gradually he begins to quarrel with everyone about everything and hides within the shell of his possessions to protect himself from everything and everyone. Yes, we may have come close to Balzac's "la Peau de Chagrin:" "Even though they are at the two extremities of the moral world, the savage and the philosopher are equally disgusted by property." Robert Owen was even more categorical: "As long as private property exists, under its natural influence man will be raised in a state of ignorant egotism, i.e., he will try to clutch at anything which could turn into his private property; and since everyone is raised in the spirit of this principle, everyone will openly or secretly be against his friends in order to obtain a bigger share of life's profusion."

Have you seen, my friend, how some people spend a lifetime skimming on the surface of the river and only glance at the deep parts, fearing to approach them, even though the water there is the quietest? Naturally, there is nothing insulting in this, for there may be an undertow and they may drown. However, is it not shameful and insulting when such a person, assuming that he is a writer, begins to imagine (and even to believe) that he is in the deep part, and begins to discuss major problems? Others pretend that there are no depths and continue to deal with petty matters or to belittle big ones. However, one cannot swim in the shallow parts of the river but can only make meaningless noises....Yes, please also note that everyone speaks about the truth, but how few speak the language of the truth? If you write frankly, with all your heart and soul, your life turns into an infinite concern but not for yourself, rather for the lives of all the others.

"When we were pouring the foundations....Oh, what troubles we had!" the poet exclaimed. Now, however, when it is the building that is being erected, is it any easier? For we are not dealing with some kind of "petty happiness" but with the great happiness of all people! It is precisely at this point that we face the evil spirit of consumerism which is crazily enamored precisely of the "petty happiness." Naturally, it does not always openly show its egotistical credo. It frequenty dons the mask of concern for the happiness of man and for his all-round development, and for some reason, begins to plead in favor of unlimited favor of private property, neglecting the far greater importance of socialist public ownership. Together we read Marx and Engels and we find that place in THE COMMUNIST MANIFESTO which reads that communists are not against private property earned through personal toil; they oppose the type of ownership which could control someone else's labor. However, how is it that when we come across this thought, to some it becomes clear that this applies to someone else's labor while others ignore it or simply distort it? Are we reading with different eyeglasses thoughts which directly affect our own lives? This is probably the case. Helvetius himself pointed out that it is interest that gives various objects different colors for different individuals....

My friend, you know that progress and society hardly follow a straight line. A train moves on tracks, as everyone knows, and if it leaves the tracks there is a wreck. Social progress, however, cannot take place by schedule. In this case a ship sails in the open sea and the compass is not always accurate, for millions of people are tugging at its arm here and there according to their own interests, frequently without realizing it. "We must be proud," Hertzen wrote, "that we are not threads, we are not needles in hands of fate, which is sewing the multicolored fabric of history....We know that this fabric is being sewn with our help. However, this is not our objective, it is not our purpose or a lesson to be learned, but the consequence of a complex general guarantee which binds everything extant through its beginnings and its ends, and its causes and effects. This is not all. We can change the design of a carpet. There is no owner, there is no design, there is only a foundation and we are by ourselves."

Trends in social life are never something abstract or anonymous. They are always carried by living people, by one or another individual. The point is that in the entire complexity of human interrelationships we do not seek with sufficient persistence and discover the true motive force, the interest which, in turn, is a form of manifestation of ownership relations. In the course of this tireless clash of interests, whose gravity depends on the level of property inequality, in the final account, almost never do we find someone boasting of being on the side of forces which are hindering social progress.

This, precisely, is the entire trouble: how to identify those who block the path of the new, of progress, so that we may determine the means with which to oppose them. Every one of us is involved in this struggle between the new and the old and it is very, very difficult to question the sincerity of your comrade....Naturally, the criterion was discovered and formulated quite accurately by Lenin: the individual must be judged not by his "thoughs and feelings" but by his actions. It turns out, however, that it is quite difficult to engage in really useful action and drop verbosity and verbiage.

If we merely agree, as some people claim, that consumerism appears and thrives precisely because some individuals are short of "intellect" which, please note, my friend, "is the only thing which can keep us 'healthily' away from excess," the task of surmounting consumerism may be reduced to a purely educational problem of how to help everyone gain the necessary "personal intellect" and no more! There would be no problem of ownership relations to be resolved. However, we come across people with a rather high "personal intellect" who do not keep any kind of distance away from excesses and not a word is being said about it....We see, therefore, that instead of explaining and proving, year after year all we hear is preaching....

However, if it is clearly understood that consumerism is based on economics, the struggle against it will assume more realistic features. Greater persistence will be displayed in the search for sources from which it draws its vital nourishment and grows in front of our eyes. And, in order to prevent it from blocking the sun, it is precisely these sources that must be eliminated boldly, unhesitatingly.

COMMENT ON PRAGUE WORLD MARXIST REVIEW MEETING

Prague RUDE PRAVO in Czech 30 Nov 81 p 6

/Article by Jan Hrobar: "Voice of Fraternal Parties"/

/Text/ The international conference of fraternal parties on the work of the journal OTAZKY MIRU A SOCIALISM /Problems of Peace and Socialism/ held in Prague last week represents an important event for the world communist and labor movements. Ninety delegations of fraternal parties gathered here, the highest number recorded for meetings of this kind. That the delegations were headed by top or prominent party representatives--chairmen, general or first secretaries and members of the highest party organs--underscored the importance of this conference. This large and authoritative assembly was the expression of the wishes of fraternal parties for and their interest in international conferences, of growing endeavors for contacts, cooperation and joint handling of topical problems.

The conference evaluated the role of the journal which for more than two decades as an indispensable tool of all revolutionary and progressive forces has been disseminating the truth about socialism and communicating the experiences of fraternal parties and all that enriches revolutionary theory and practice. It was rightly noted that it is a unique international platform with no equal among worldwide communications--the journal is published in all world languages and it has 66 national editions. Its existence and fruitful function contribute to the unity and action capability of the movement. The discussion brought forth further suggestions for the deepening and expanding of its authority.

The Prague conference at the same time went far beyond the consideration of the editorial work of the journal. Naturally so, for the existence and the function of the journal requires deep analysis of a very broad spectrum of topical questions raised by the growth and activity of the revolutionary movement and the general situation in the world arena. Moreover, the conference took place at the time of serious polarization of the international situation and this further increased its importance. The concern for peace of communists dominated the discussion.

The conference participants considered all aspects of the situation that has developed in the world, the warmongering of the imperialistic forces and their attempts to retaliate for the victory of the forces of progress; and the tasks with which the international communist and labor movements and all the progressive and anti-imperialistic forces are faced at the present time.

The discussion participants gave the convincing answer that the place of communists is nownere else but in the first ranks of fighters for freedom and disarmament. They confirmed the steadfast determination to oppose the reckless policy of imperialism and expressed the unbreakable will to fulfill the mission of the avant-grade of peace forces. In their presentations, one heard the voices of the nations that refuse to live in the shadow of heaps of atomic and other weapons feverishly amassed in their homes by American imperialists and the armorbearers of the NATO pact. They made it known that a powerful wave of resistence has arisen in the world against the imperialistic threat to mankind.

The peace offensive of the Soviet Union, the activity of the entire socialist community as the principal force of the peace front of mankind received serious appraisal.

The conference participants at the same time turned attention to cooperation with all opponents of American weapon rattling. They called attention to the fact that the need for the closing of the ranks of the international communist and labor movements and the unity of all anti-imperialistic forces is greater today than ever.

The increasing role of all other forms of struggle against imperialism and reaction was pointed out. The need to oppose, on the ideological front, the growing efforts of the reactionaries to weaken and divide the proponents of peace and disarmament, and the intensified anticommunist and anti-Soviet slanders and campaigns.

The policy of Peking Maoists was subjected to sharp critique in the discussion. There was an absolute dominance of the view that Marxist-Leninist parties cannot hold a neutral attitude toward Maoism which, with its ideology foreign to the working class, its expansionism and hegemonism and its association with American imperialism, represents a serious danger for nations and the world peace. The conference participants expressed resolute support of all revolutionary and progressive forces that are exposed to malicious attacks and intrigues of the world reaction in Afghanistan, Cambodia, Cuba, Nicaragua, Angola and on other leading fronts.

At the conference, in a comradely work atmosphere, each of the participating parties expressed its opinions freely on the basis of full equality. When the group is so large and the spectrum of questions it deals with so broad, it is not unusual to have differences of opinions on some of the problems considered.

The international conference of fraternal parties confirmed the invincible faith and strength of the communist and all revolutionary movements. It revealed that the obstacles place before mankind by imperialism are not unconquerable. It showed what is the place and the mission of the avant-grade of the world peace forces, and it constituted an important contribution to the current universal struggle with the forces of reaction and war.

DIFFERING EVALUATIONS OF POPE PUBLISHED

CSSR Regime's Criticism

Bratislava PRAVDA in Slovak 18 Dec 81 p 3

[Article by Milan Sciranko, candidate for doctor of science: "The Ideology and Influence of Clerical Anticommunism"]

[Excerpt] Following the short pontificate of John Paul I, John Paul II, otherwise known as Karol Wojtyla, became the head of the Catholic Church. As the Luxembourg author, Jo Mutterge, wrote in his book, "Where Is Poland Headed" (Ou va la Pologne), "after the election of Wojtyla as pope, the Western press began to speak of the Eastern policy of Paul VI as a 'naive policy' which, they said, had come to grief. The press openly called on John Paul II to institute a firmer policy toward the countries of Eastern Europe. His election was assumed to be a mandate for sharpening relations between the state and the Catholic Church in Poland." In this way, bourgeois ideological centers once again emphasized the importance of the church in the struggle against real socialism and progress in the world. Brzezinski attempted to guide the church more actively as an important ideological institution against the socialist countries and, most of all, against the People's Republic of Poland. "When Wojtyla was active in Cracow," writes Jo Mutterge, "it was known that he supported the activity of Catholic activists and priests, or 'laymen.' These 'activists' for the most part were inclined toward militant catholicism, and their activities in the background brought about efforts leading to the creation of the conditions for the founding of a clerical political party." Under the guise of "human rights" then, a way was being sought toward the pluralization of the political system of socialist society. The "main" defender of human rights in the form of a representative of a "Western democracy," former president J. Carter, found in the Cracow cardinal "a passionate defender of human rights," whose views concurred on many points with the thoughts propagandized by "dissident circles," which called for the gradual dismantling of the political structure in Poland. This alliance is attested to also by the fact that long before the arrival of Wojtyla at the Vatican there existed a personal contact between him and Brzezinski, which was confirmed by the presence of the latter at the cermonial investiture of John Paul II on the papal throne in October 1978.

Even before this, the current pope was known for his views, which were evident in his efforts to maintain good relations with Western church circles in Europe, above all in the FRG, but also in the United States and, last but not least, with circles of the Polish political emigration. Even our clerical immigration has achieved a place in these efforts. The unjustified demands of Slovak clericofascists and their lackeys are often passed on through official Vatican representatives.

Various actions are organized against our patriotically inclined priests, who are interested in the development and flowering of our peoples and nationalities. The class roots of this "crusade" are clear. The Fifteenth Plenum of the CPCZ Central Committee, as of March 1980, "values the active participation of those who believe in socialist construction and respects greatly the progressive clerics of all legally functioning churches who are united with the people and display a positive attitude toward the policies of our country, to its efforts on behalf of a flourishing of the fatherland and the assurance of world peace.

Cardinal Tomasek's View

Prague KATOLICKE NOVINY in Czech No 45, 8 Nov 81 p 3

[Article by Frantisek Cardinal Tomasek: "Again with the Holy Father"]

[Text] I send you all greetings from St Peter's Square, where I last was on 13 May, on the day when the forces of darkness there attempted to murder our Holy Father, John Paul II. Immediately afterward, I sent a report concerning this, with the plea that you all ardently and constantly remember the Holy Father in your daily prayers and devotions. We may speak of a miracle, in that the Holy Father has remained not only alive, but has returned so quickly to good physical condition. I became personally convinced of this when I was near him on St Peter's Square during his general audience of Wednesday, 14 October. The square had been filling up since the morning with pilgrims and tourists from all the continents. Suddenly, everyone burst out in turbulent rejoicing, for the Holy Father had just arrived. He stood in an open jeep, blessing everyone on all sides, and bowed in greeting to all with his customary smile. The rejoicing of those present broke out even more. And it reached a crescendo when the Holy Father got out of the jeep and ever so slowly made his way among the rejoicing multitudes of people of various races and colors which lined the streets, so that he could open that unique audience which may be experienced only here.

The Holy Father opened the audience with the sign of the cross and the customary greeting "Praise be to Jesus Christ." He also greeted me and the other bishops who were present. The secretaries to the Holy Father then read the names of specific larger groups, the Holy Father bowed to them in greeting, and they stormily acclaimed him.

Then the Holy Father pronounced his main speech, in which he again remembered the bloody 13 May. He is fully aware that at that time it was a matter of life and death. For this reason, he again expressed great thanks for the extraordinary intercession of the Mother of God, the Virgin Mary, for 13 May was the first day of her revelation at Fatima. And he again thanked all those who were close to him, especially in their prayers and devotions. He stated that this event had given him a great opportunity, by allowing him to more fully make a peaceful sacrifice for the church and the whole world through his unity with the suffering Christ. Then the Holy Father addressed individually the larger foreign language groups: in French, English, Spanish, Portuguese, German and Polish.

Finally, he called upon me and the other bishops who were present, to stand beside him and to perform the apostolic benediction along with him for all those present.

When we stepped up to join him, the entire assembly recited the Latin prayer "I believe in God," and then we pronounced, along with the Holy Father, the apostolic benediction to all those present and to those who were listening on the radio.

And with this we were near to that particularly dear moment when I was able to greet the Holy Father. I greeted him not only for myself, but also for all of you who think of him lovingly. I assured the Holy Father of additional ongoing prayers, and at the same time I congratulated him on the third anniversary of his election as head of the church. The Holy Father also remembers you all regularly in his prayers and sends you his special benediction.

Since I saw the Holy Father up close, I can inform you with great pleasure that he appears healthy and is ready for work. Continue to remember him in your prayers.

His mission in the world has always been and will always be and possesses an ever greater significance: We have a common heavenly father, because we are, one to the other, throughout the world, brothers and sisters. We must help each other in the spirit of love: spouses must help each other, as must family members, neighbors, people at places of work, during daily contact, always and everywhere. This Christian civilization of love provides man with a proper focus and fulfillment for his life and contributes to the preservation of marriage, the family and human society.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE MEETINGS OF LUBLIN VOIVODSHIP PZPR REPORTED

Position on Agricultural-Food Industry

Lublin SZTANDAR LUDU in Polish 16 Nov 81 p 2

[Article: "Deliberations of Executive Boards of the PZPR KW [voivodship committees]: Lublin, Praise for the Working Forces of the Agricultural-Food Industry"]

[Text] (Our own correspondents) The deliberations which the PZPR KW executive board held Saturday in Lublin devoted one of its two points of the agenda to an assessment of the working of the agricultural-food industry, giving special attention to the supply of basic raw materials to meet its processing needs and to the attitudes of the working forces.

From just about every angle, the situation in this industry is exceptionally complicated. There has been a clear drop in sales and a sizeable rise in the payroll fund in practically all the plants whose production determines the level of market supply. Despite the overall decline in production, owing to changes in the structure of the item assortment and the limitations on nonmarket sales, deliveries of goods to the market have increased in some cases. This applies, for example, to flour and grain products, milk for consumption, white cheeses, butter, poultry, jams, preserves, and pickled vegetables.

The procurement of grain has dropped considerably in the recent period. Owing to the shortage of the raw material, the potato industry is also having difficulties. The planned quantities of tomatoes, apples, pears, cherries, prunes, and wild strawberries were not procured. The plans for the procurement of raspberries, cauliflower, and cucumbers did not go well either.

The meat and egg industry faced the worst situation. It is calculated that procurement will fall short of this year's plan by about 14,500 tons of livestock for slaughter and 28 million eggs. Poultry procurement is expected to reach planned levels. At the present time it is only the procurement of milk which is exceeding the processing capacities in the voivodship's existing plants. Therefore, some has been transferred to other voivodships.

The problem of the agricultural-food industry's processing power was not discussed, because it had already been the subject of many sessions of the voivodship's political and administrative leaders. The industry's developmental plans and justified demands concerning the need for raw materials are generally known. Nonetheless, it was decided that there are possibilities for a more rapid expansion of the processing capacity in the dairy industry, for example, by adapting for this purpose the under-used installations in other sectors of the economy, such as the "Elektromontaz" plant in the Lublin Voivodship locality of Ostrowo. In this connection it was recommended that appropriate studies and actions be undertaken.

The above-mentioned great difficulties brought up in the executive board's sessions are taking place and being covered by the demand of the agricultural-food industry, especially those of the packaging for the fruit and vegetable industry. In this matter there was a search for solutions, stemming, for example, from the need to activate the procurement of multipurpose packaging and the development of alternate packaging production.

The principle of giving priority to the agricultural-food industry is generally respected, but there are problems nonetheless with guaranteeing the necessary supply of needed liquid fuels and resources for keeping things running, with spare parts for machinery and equipment, and building materials.

Against the backdrop of this complicated situation and the various serious difficulties and barriers, the executive committee of the KW gave a very high rating to the working forces in the agricultural-food industry and gave them its recognition and thanks. The working forces of this industry's plants have not exploited their right to strike or protest. Wherever the raw materials conditions have permitted, they have also worked on free Saturdays and on Sundays off. The raw materials crisis has inclined many management teams to introduce those production solutions which have insured and are continuing to insure a work front for their employees. There are known examples of commitment on the part of the working forces engaged in activating the procurement of needed raw materials, of their bringing in the raw materials using their own vehicles. There are examples where people have produced soap to meet their own needs. The employees of the grain industry and bakeries, of the dairy industry, potato industry, confectionary industry, and fruit and vegetable industry also merit great recognition.

A second equally broad and interesting subject of the deliberations was the problem of employing post-elementary school graduates. We shall discuss it in a separate publication. The executive committee discussed and ratified a plan of preparations for the next general PZPR Voivodship Committee meeting, which will take up the problems of strengthening the party within the workers' community.

School and Information Center Strikes

Lublin SZTANDAR LUDU in Polish 19 Nov 81 pp 1,2

[Article: "Position of the Executive Committee of the PZPR Voivodship Committee in Lublin Concerning Strike Activity in the Educational Centers and Schools of Lublin Voivodship," issued by the Executive Committee, dated 18 November 1981]

> [Text] (Our own information) Yesterday the Executive Committee of the PZPR Voivodship Committee in Lublin held a meeting to deliberate and assess the situation in the teaching community in connection with the promise of strike action in educational centers and schools of Lublin Voivodship. After a careful and thorough analysis of the causes and sources of the growing conflict in education, the Executive Board took the position published below on the teachers' planned protest activity. The major problems of the youth movement were presented and discussed as the second point of the agenda.

During the past few weeks there has been a worsening of the conflict situations in the educational community, in which there are a host of difficult and complicated problems, as in many other fields. As the result of critical comments coming in from the trade unions and educational groups, administrative officials of the voivodship have undertaken a number of steps aimed at upgrading the working conditions of the educational centers, expanding the scope of preschool care, the construction of new installations, and so on. Changes have also been made in the position of school superintendent in charge of education and upbringing in the manner consistent with the existing Charter of Rights and Duties of the Teacher and the principles for appointing employees of the state administration.

Mr Kazimierz Jagowdzik, a nonparty-member activist of the Polish Teachers' Union (ZNP) and experienced teacher for many years, was named school superintendent of education and upbringing. This change resulted from the broad sign campaign undertaken by the Education and Upbringing Section of Solidarity and the formulation of decrees and resolutions of protest against the appointment of a school superintendent without consultation with Solidarity. There was no mention of any warning or reservation concerning the school superintendent's professional or moral qualifications. The immediate recall or suspension of the school superintendent was accomplished through the initial condition of talks with administrative officials on many important problems which are vital to the functioning of education in Lublin Voivodship.

It was against this backdrop finally that strike preparedness was announced for educational centers and schools, calling for what is termed an active strike beginning on 20 November, counting on the participation of teachers and youngsters in the strike.

The Executive Committee of the PZPR Voivodship Committee is disturbed to see that another attempt is being made in our voivodship to bring social conflicts onto the school grounds. In the worsening socioeconomic situation, given the difficulties of daily life, as the result of the wise judgment of the voivodship's working people and the desire for agreement exhibited on both sides by trade union activists and voivodship officials, we have avoided many conflicts of a local nature and foundation.

The Executive Committee thinks that the instigation of strike sentiments should be decidedly resisted by the society of the voivodship and given the PZPR's efforts to create a front of national understanding, an idea supported by ZSL, SD, the bishops, the trade unions, and other social organizations, an idea which has gained the general approval of the society.

We are calling on teachers and upbringers, on party members and nonmembers, on all those who hold the idea of social understanding dear, to oppose decisively the strike action which has been undertaken. Let us not allow the idea of understanding and agreement to be destroyed by ambitious games. We think that it goes against the teacher's dignity to exploit upbringing authority to drag children and young people in to resolve conflicts taking place in the adult world.

We are calling on pedagogic councils, parent committees, and employees of work establishments for joint effort and a decisive stance against rashness, to insure that our schools, our children and young people, will have the possibility of learning in peace and of having the proper conditions for the correct conduct of the instruction and upbringing processes.

The Executive Committee expresses the conviction that through joint effort and a decisive stance by the teaching community and the society, we will be able to do without aspirations to shift tensions and strikes to the voivodship.

ROLE OF WORKERS' MOVEMENT IN ACHIEVING NATIONAL UNITY

Bucharest ANALE DE ISTORIE in Romanian No 4, Jul-Aug 81 pp 51-78

/Article by Virgil Smarcea and Florian Tanasescu: "Historical Role of the Romanian Labor Movement in the Romanian People's Struggle for National Unity, Independence, Territorial Integrity and Consolidation of the Single Romanian State"/

/Text/ The Romanians' history presents the picture of a people soon confronted with great adversities and vicissitudes caused by the conflict of the rival interests of the great empires in this area of Europe. There are few peoples on our continent who have known such distruction and alienation of material and cultural values, harassment, foreign pressures and interference, invasions and territorial annexations as the Romanian people have. There is no question that the Romanians' troubled existence in their ancient home, overrun by so many foreigners, and the courage with which they defended their own existence have helped to check the expansionist trends of the central continental states, creating favorable conditions for more rapid socioeconomic progress in particular but also for political, scientific, artistic and other advances.

Proud, brave, steadfast, freedom-loving and deeply devoted to their native land and to the idea of understanding and good coexistence with all peoples, the Romanians have found in their own moral qualities the inexhaustible source of resistance to difficulties. Though forced apart in their own land by the seizure of extensive territories by the great empires of the time, the Romanians did not change or vitiate those qualities. On the contrary they strengthened them, proving the hardihood of their character and their complete confidence in their own forces and in the triumph of historic law as well as reason in international relations.

Awareness of their common origin and lineage, constantly maintained like a sacred flame, and the sufferings endured by the Romanians over the years cemented their feeling of solidarity and steeled their energies to achieve their union within their ancient borders and to develop their nation in freedom and independence. National agreement on these vital questions took the form of active and full participation of all social-political forces of Romanian society in the struggle for unity and independence upon which the Romanian people's very existence depended.

In a historical period when large portions of Romanian territory were under foreign occupation and the masses were strongly motivated by the ideal of union and independence, the labor movement in Romania favored and staunchly supported these ancient aspirations of the Romanian people. In all its activity it gave the highest expression to the Romanian people's ideals of national and social emancipation and to their long-standing traditions of defense of their national existence and of independence and integrity of their fatherland. The labor movement always viewed the aim of national unity in close correlation and interdependence with that of achieving or defending national sovereignty and independence.

The objective laws of the Romanian people's advance on the path of progress urgently required furthering the process of restoring national-state unity, which had entered upon a new stage in its evolution with the unfication of Moldavia and Wallachia in 1859. Realizing the importance of that historic action, the socialist movement also expressed confidence in the Romanians' ultimate victory, being on the same level of understanding with the entire Romanian people. As the socialist Nicolae Codreanu concluded, "For most of us 1859 marks the beginning of the period of regeneration of the Romanians, the happy period of consolidation of the Romanian state and, in a word, the period of organization..." (1). In the same spirit but with broader implications ROMANIA MUNCITOARE, the central press organ of the PSD /Social-Democratic Party/, pointed out that "All Romanians unanimously recognize the greatness of this deed (unification of Moldavia and Wallachia -- our note) not only as a historic achievement but also as an omen for the future, because there are still Romanians outside the area of the united ones" (2). The same publication associated the unification in 1859 with the great figure of Prince Alexandru Ioan Cuza. ROMANIA MUNCITOARE for 21 October 1910 said, "The unification of the Romanian principalities, a very noble and patriotic deed, is epitomized in the person of Cuza-Voda." The said labor publication initiated the idea of raising a monument in memory of the Pasoptist revolutionary, the fighter for unification and patriot Alexandru Ioan Cuza.

But the labor movement's most eloquent and revealing estimate of the unification in 1859 was the application, beginning in 1908, of the decision of the Conference of Socialist Circles and Trade Union Organizations in 1907 whereby 24 January was declared a "red holiday" because it was a "symbol of awakening, unification and organization" (3) for the proletariat as well.

[illegible]formation of the modern Romanian state through the unification of Moldavia and [illegible]llachia served to encourage the national struggle of Romanians everywhere. Modern Romania polarized the attention and hopes of the entire Romanian people as the center of attraction for all the Romanian provinces under foreign occupation and the center of diffusion of the political-diplomatic initiatives to carry out the ideal of unity and independence, of ever vigilant maintenance of the national consciousness, and of full confidence in the Romanians' ultimate victory.

The ceaseless struggless for national freedom and progress duly led to the historic proclamation of the complete independence of the Romanian state on the memorable day of 9 May 1877. In those stirring times the socialist circles and the whole Romanian proletariat enthusiastically joined the first ranks of the creators of the ideal of independence and actively supported it both by writing and by actually participating with arms on the battlefields or by producing the necessities to maintain the Romanian army. "But today is the time when the Romanians, in the elan and enthusiasm of past memories, take up arms to defend their independence," as the newspaper SOCIALISTUL, the press organ of the Bucharest Socialist Circle, quite rightly said, also making the distinction between the just war waged by Romania and the wars resulting from the rivalries among the great powers. The same newspaper pointed out, "Europe, free in 1848, was threatened in 1854 and went to shed its blood under the walls of the Crimea. Why? It was a necessity. In 1793 France was threatened by a coalition and had to defend itself. In 1854 the East was threatened by the Bear of the North and needed Europe's intervention. Who formed the coalition in 1793? The crowned heads of three empires. Who caused the eastern crisis in 1854? A crowned head" (4).

Reflecting the patriotic stand of the socialist circles and Romanian labor in general, Nicolae Codreanu said in a letter of 2 May 1877 to his friend and comrade at arms Constantin Dobrogeanu-Gherea, "Romania is at war with one of its many enemies, namely Turkey. The idea of the duty that must now be done for the nation is troubling not only men of honor but everyone, and I have certainly thought about what I should do for Romania under the circumstances and how I shall prove myself worthy of a true son of the Romanian nation. Therefore I have decided to leave the local medical service for a time and to go where the enemy's weapons or rather man's inhumanity is destroying young and strong lives at the whim and caprice of two tyrants" (5).

In fact, members of the socialist circles, physicians or students, as well as many workers volunteered for the Romanian army like Dr Nicolae Codreanu, and some of them fell heroically on duty, such as I. Corvin, P. Lazarescu et al. The valuable contribution made by the group of socialist medical students that included C. Stauceanu, I. Niculescu, Al. Spiroiu and Gh. Sabin among others to care of the wounded who fell in combat at Grivita was well known. Some socialists (N. Codreanu, N. Russel, C. I. Istrati, Gh. Sabin, C. Stauceanu, V. Gh. Manicea and Al. Spiroiu) were decorated with orders and medals for outstanding merit during the war of independence (6).

One important aspect of the aid lent by the Romanian labor movement to the heroic struggle of the Romanian army south of the Danube to establish the proclamation of absolute independence by force of arms was the collection of contributions for the soldiers on the battlefields and the donation of large sums of money for material support of the war or of the families bereaved by it. The Bucharest Builders Society donated 1,000 lei to the Romanian army (7). Workers at the Turnu Severin railroad station, the printers and shoemakers in Bucharest, the railwaymen at the Filaret Station in Bucharest, and the personnel of the army construction sites and the Third District of the Romanian Railroads donated various sums totaling 1,144 lei (8) to purchase weapons or pharmaceuticals, medical instruments and materials needed by the Romanian Red Cross. The shoemakers in Bucharest and the male and female workers of the Bucharest Briol House gave financial aid to the families of the soldiers who fell in the war (9) etc.

Such initiatives were also taken by the Romanian workers in the territories under foreign rule, especially those in Cernauti, Brasov, Fagara, Sibiu, Deva, Cluj, Abrud, Aiud, Timisoara, sighet etc.

The Romanian people's victory in 1877 was welcomed with complete satisfaction by the socialist movement and the entire Romanian people, and it resounded throughout Europe, especially in the southeastern area of the continent. As it said in the Resolution on the National Problem ratified by the Sixth Students Congress held in Braila (10) in September 1883, "An absolutely free Dacia will always be the ideal of Romanian youth."

Looking back on the history of the Romanian people, LUMEA NOUA for 7 May 1900 pointed out the significance of achieving independence in spirited, patriotic words: "There are days in the life of a people that are destined to be written large in history by virtue of the events they recall, and they will remain for posterity as peaks leading upward from the times when the most glorious deeds of the nation were done .... The proclamation of Romania's independence was unquestionably an act of the greatest significance, and it is a dividing line between the centuries of oppression under Turkish rule and the independence we enjoy today. Through sacrifices and self-denial and at the cost of their blood the Romanian people have succeeded in freeing themselves from the Turks in a glorious war, securing an independence that will enable them to develop and progress on the path of civilization...." (11)

In reference to the troubled past of the Romanian people, Sofia Nadejde pointed out with zeal that the fulfillment of the ideal of independence "put an end to so many humiliations and sufferings of centuries." She went on to say, "No ideal was possible when we were crushed by foreign oppression. We needed the wide air of independence for the Romanian people to advance" (12).

When the Congress of Berlin was convened after the war to settle the differences between the great European powers, it decided that Dobrogea, an ancient Romanian territory, should be reunited with Romania while the counties in southern Bessarabia should be annexed to Russia (13).

The Romanian labor movement strongly opposed the policy of territorial compensation promoted by the great powers at the expense of Romania and the small and medium states in general. As Cristian Racovski pointed out, before the outbreak of the conflict in 1877 Russia and Austria-Hungary already "had an agreement that served their ultimate purpose," whereby "Russia agreed that Austria should occupy Bosnia and Herzegovina" while "Austro-Hungarian diplomacy allowed Russia to extend to the mouths of the Danube by annexing Cahul, Izmail and Cetatea Alba counties, thus shortening its 'road to Constantinople'" (14).

It was neither the first nor the last time the socialist and labor movements in Romania exposed the nefarious role of the two surrounding absolutist empires (Habsburg and Czarist) in the peoples' struggle for their national-state unity and their free and sovereign existence. The Romanian socialists had not forgotten the highly significant historical comment made by Friedrich Engels in his letter of 1888 to Ioan Nadejde, director of the Marxist journal CONTEMPORANUL, to the effect that the problem of uniting the Romanians and the other oppressed peoples could not be solved as long as the two absolutist empires existed, and that the defeat of one of those empires and the victory of the other would be a constant threat to the very existence of those peoples. Fr. Engels pointed out on the same occasion that only the simultaneous downfall of both the multinational empires would permit the liberation of the oppressed peoples and the national unification of some states or the restoration of others. In the light of that prediction the Romanian socialists took a firm stand against the policy promoted by the Austro-Hungarian and Czarist empires, expressing their complete confidence that the objective factors of the peoples' development and their advance on the path of progress would ultimately lead to fulfillment of their ideal of national liberation.

By the end of the last century the publications and works published by the socialist movement were exposing the expansionist tendencies of the great empires at the time and their bad effects upon the peoples who were the objects of their territorial partition. As a work published in 1897 in the Library of the daily LUMEA NOUA, the central press organ of the PSDMR [Social-Democratic Workers Party of Romania], pointed out, "Russia has always wanted to lay its hands on our countries, Wallachia and Moldavia." The same work went on to discuss the Romanian people's historic past, stressing the sufferings caused by the very frequent violations of their ancestral land by other peoples driven by the desire to expand. The discussion began with the Russo-Turkish War in 1711, going on to the subsequent conflicts between the two empires, every one of which had dreadful effects upon the Romanian lands. "In 1877-1878 Russia started a war against Turkey on the ground that it wanted to deliver the Bulgarians as faithful Christians from the Turkish yoke. The Russian army was so weak that it almost had to turn back in defeat at the hands of the hastily mobilized Turkish army. Only the help given by the Romanians at Plevna... could save the Russians... When he was cornered by Osman Pasha at Plevna, the grand duke telegraphed Prince Carol I of Romania: 'Christendom is lost. In God's name cross the Danube under any circumstances...' In return for all those sacrifices... we incurred great affliction and harm. The Romanians told the world of the injustice that had been done them, but in vain" (15).

The war waged by Romania and Russia against the Ottoman Empire and the blood shed by the Romanian and Russian soldiers were a landmark in the history of relations between the Romanian people and the Russian people. Nicolae Ceausescu, president of socialist Romania, pointed out that "During this great war of critical importance to the cause of the Balkan peoples' freedom and independence, a strong solidarity and camaraderie were formed between the Romanian and Russian troops, and the old historic friendship between the two peoples was developed even further. The facts prove that there were always close ties between the democratic, progressive forces in the two countries in spite of the Czarist empire's policy and in opposition to it. These relations were to take on a new content with the development of the revolutionary labor movement in both countries, with the consolidation of class solidarity between the Romanian and Russian proletariat, and with the struggle for the victory of the October Revolution and the defense of the young Soviet state and for progress and peace" (16).

The expansionist policy of the great empires, so strikingly revealed by the PSDMR, continued to concern its direct successor, the PSD, reorganized in 1910. Its central publications and various socialist militants at assemblies or meetings decried "the Austrian empire's rapacious desires" (17) at the expense of Bosnia and Herzegovina, "the rapacious policy of Austria and Russia, who did not shrink from trading in the peoples' rights and freedoms" (18), the "traditional perfidious policy of Austrian diplomacy" (19), and "the great empires' attempts at economic and political expansion and domination over the small countries in their immediate vicinity" (20).

Confident of the revolutionary power of its own people as well as other peoples, the Romanian revolutionary movement sympathized with any manifestation of revolt on the part of populations under foreign rule, seeing in them the signals of the storm that would lead to the disappearance of the multinational monarchies. As ROMANIA MUNCITOARE for 6 November 1905 generalized, "These uprisings mark the beginning of the political liquidation of the czarist empire, accompanied by the social dislocation of the hateful regime" (21).

In the full course of World War I the Romanian socialists foresaw the imminent downfall of the czarist empire. "While it cannot be said, at least for the time being, that the war will bring the revolution upon any one of the other belligerent countries, that is becoming more and more probable, one might say more certain, in the case of Russia" (27).

As the RCP Program points out, the acquisition of state independence in 1877, to which the Romanian labor movement also contributed, "lent a new and powerful impetus to Romania's socioeconomic development and profoundly affected its entire historical evolution on the path of social progress, enabling the Romanian people to assert themselves more and more strongly as an independent nation" (23).

The results the Romanian people obtained in the way of economic and social-political development after 1877 proved the importance of achieving national sovereignty and independence, which opened up new prospects for the evolution of Romanian society.

Along with Romania's overall development, the Romanian labor movement considerably broadened its field of activity, gradually asserting itself as the social-political force with the most advanced view of the vital problems that were concerning all Romanians. New principles based on the indisputable truth that the will of a people to be united, free and independent overcomes any obstacle, as the previous history of the Romanians had made abundantly clear, were to amplify the Romanian labor movements efforts on behalf of that ideal.

The Romanian labor movement's entire theoretical and practical activity at the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the next strikingly indicated that its objectives were confined to the Romanian people's major interests.

The problem of the struggle for national emancipation was soundly substantiated in the program documents and in the writings of leading militants of the proletarian political party in all stages of its development, and they strongly opposed foreign domination and solemnly proclaimed the inalienable and inviolable right of the Romanian nation, as well as all nations, to a free and independent existence. From the draft program of the socialist circles written in 1880 to the first Marxist program in Romania, published in 1886, and the program documents of the PSDMR, the PSD, the Socialist Party and the Communist Party, the Romanian labor movement went through a period of analysis and fruitful activity, one of investigation and formulation of principles that would best answer the questions facing the Romanian people.

In this period the socialist journals and dailies BESARABIA, DACIA VIITOARE, EMANCIPAREA, SACEALA, CONTEMPORANUL, LUMEA NOUA, ROMANIA MUNCITOARE and LUPTA entered memorable pages of great theoretical significance in Romanian journalism in the broad campaign on behalf of the cause of the Romanian nation and its historic rights to the Romanian territories seized by force of arms by the great empires. Confident of the Romanian people's revolutionary energies and their capacity and power to resolve difficult situations, the socialist press and the militants of the labor movement, who were devoting their writing to the constant service of the cause of their compatriots, expressed their confidence in the achievement of the Romanian people's complete unity. "We have escaped the descendants of Soliman and we shall succeed in rescuing Transylvania, our sister, from the descendants of Attila! Is this unification possible or is it only the dream of deluded youth? I shall say that if justice has any power on this earth, Transylvania and the other regions of the old Dacia where Romanians are in the majority must be and will be joined sooner or later to the Romanian state" (24). Those were the words of vigorous optimism written by one of the socialist publications of the time. Edited by Mihail N. Saulescu, C. Mille, Gr. Maniu, Al. Badarau, V. Gh. Mortun, Vintila C. A. Rosetti et al., DACIA VIITOARE was published in Paris beginning 1 February 1883 and then in Brussels from the sixth issue on, with the mission of militating for "national unity" and for "a Romania from the Danube to the Tisza."

In this stage of its development the socialist movement already sympathized with the Romanian people's sufferings and emphatically expressed the view that no sacrifices, including the supreme one, could deter it from the resolute struggle to free the compatriots long under the foreign yoke. As the program article in the daily SACEALA for 29 January 1884 said with patriotic fervor, "Any promise is as sacred to us as the most binding oath that a Romanian can take, the oath upon the memory and ashes of our Romanian ancestors! ... We shall fight to the last drop of blood ... to see our beloved country strong and respected by all!"

Feeling that every people had the right to self-determination, the socialist militants declared their "sympathy with any movement or event favoring a national unification" (25). They believed "A fragmented nation is condemned to inability to develop the material, intellectual and spiritual resources that it possesses" (26).

The Program of the PSD in Romania, ratified in 1910 (27) and expressing the will of the entire party and all Romanian workers, also declared itself flatly against any national subjugation. Many leading militants of the PSD, as well as members of the socialist organizations of Romanians abroad, supported and soundly substantiated in their writings the Romanian people's right to be sole masters in their own country.

Thus Zamfir C. Arbore argued that the evolutionary trend of the European peoples was "not toward invasion or annihilation of the nations" but "toward national autonomy and free development of the national spirit" (28). Teodor Iordachescu firmly declared himself for "union with the other brothers" (29) and N. D. Cocea came out for liberation of Transylvania so that Romania could restore "the lost borders of its territorial integrity" (30).

The writings of the Marxist theorist Constantin Dobrogeanu-Gherea as well as the speeches, articles, studies and papers of Cristian Racovski, Alexandru Nicolau et al. were fully indicative of their authority in the labor movement. C. Dobrogeanu-Gherea thoroughly demonstrated the Romanians' historic right to national liberation and unity. In his work "War or Neutrality," printed in 1914, he made the following theoretical points among others: "Then what are the elements that compose a people, what are the absolutely indispensable and vital requirements for their existence? They are first of course the language, and then the national consciousness, the sense of cultural, moral, spiritual and ethnic unity. Those are essential factors and requirements for the formation and life of a people... Poland is broken and partitioned among three different states and does not exist as an independent country, but there is a strong consciousness of a single people in Poland, an awareness of cultural, moral and ethic unity, and consequently there is no doubt that this consciouness will be followed sooner or later by the restoration of Poland as a single country in one way or another and in one form or another.

"If an independent country and people like Romania has part of its people under foreign rule and it is trying to unify its country and people, the latter unification is the most important because it presupposes and entails the necessity, awareness and existence of the cultural, moral, ethic and spiritual unity" (31).

In an address to the great socialist meeting organized at the Roman Arenas in Bucharest in June 1915 in support of the struggle for national liberation of the Romanians in the occupied provinces, Cristian Racovski stated in reference to Transylvania that "No law, and still less a socialist one, can accept the legitimacy of Hungarian rule.

And no Hungarian victory, however brilliant and decisive it may be, can erase from history the Transylvanian Romanians' right to freedom and independence. By no means must Transylvania, and we socialists say this loudly and clearly as we have always said it, accept the idea that it is to remain under the rule of the Hungarian oligarchy" (32).

Alexandru Nicolau pointed out in his turn that "in the many territories seized by force" the conquered populations were without national rights, a fact that turned the socialists against territorial annexations. Concerning the Transylvanian problem the author commented, "As socialist we cannot accept the rule of the Hungarian oligarchy in Transylvania. The Romanians there have the right to the fullest freedom and independence. We recognize this right of the German, Hungarian, Serbian, Ruthenian and Jewish minorities" (33).

There are many other expressions of the Romanian socialists' stands on the national problem, including the press campaign of the Romanian socialist circles in the United States belonging to the Federation of Romanian Socialists in America in support of the Romanian people's struggle for "the complete freedom of the national territories" (34).

In connection with this extensive theoretical support of the Romanian nation's inalienable right to unity and independence, in 1912 the PSD leadership organized large meetings and demonstrations in Bucharest and the provinces, at which Gheorghe Cristescu, Cristian Racovski and others spoke, in honor of the struggle of the Romanians in the occupied territories and in protest against the seizure of historic Romanian territories by the great powers. The decision of the PSD Executive Committee on this event made the point that every man and every people must develop "in their language and according to the customs of their own genius" (35), as an essential requirement that was objectively fulfilled by human society's historical evolution itself.

The Romanian population under the oppressive yoke of the Austro-Hungarian Empire and the zarist empire was subjected to a harsh regime of forced denationalization. More than once the Romanians rose to fight for liberation from foreign rule and for union with the motherland. All these demonstrations, which indicated the continuity and progress of their revolutionary struggle, enjoyed from the start the massive support of the political and trade organizations of the Romanian proletariat. The labor press and the socialist militants exposed and emphatically condemned the denationalization measures instigated by the Austro-Hungarian and czarist authorities in the conquered territories, expressing full solidarity with the Romanians there and with their bitter and heroic struggle. Note that the political organizations of the Romanian workers in the occupied territories, despite innumerable difficulties, played an active part in supporting, encouraging and organizing the Romanians' national resistance movement and in channeling it on a firmly offensive course. The press of the Romanian labor organizations in Transylvania, heavily censored by the Austro-Hungarian authorities, contained many proofs of the active presence of the idea of national liberation cleverly interlarded in the columns of the newspapers and journals. Under those circumstances the idea of the workers unity, frequently encountered in the writings of the socialist journalists in Transylvania, the Banat and Bucovina, took on the broad sense of the wish for unification of the entire Romanian people within their ancient borders. The appeal "Social-Democratic Romanian Brothers" launched by the editors of the daily ADEVARUL (36) said, "The time has come for us to gather together to be as one, for otherwise we are lost from the face of the earth."

Militants of the PSD in old Romania and leading representatives of the Romanian workers organizations across the Carpathians and of the socialist circles of Romanians abroad consistently condemned the Austro-Hungarian authorities' repressive measures against the Romanian population such as staging trials of the leaders of the national movement and the socialist journalists and militants, jailing some of them, censoring and prohibiting journals and newspapers, fining the editors of the Romanian press, prohibiting use of the Romanian language in public institutions and schools, breaking up political demonstrations and meetings, preventing development of workers trade unions etc. (37). "Every day the newspapers regardless of political persuasion decry and stigmatize the Hungarian politicians who are persecuting and oppressing the Romanians in Hungary, and for good reason the arbitrariness of the Hungarian government is to be condemned by the entire civilized world," it said in ROMANIA MUNCITOARE for 13 August 1909.

The resolution approved by the Circle of Romanian Socialist Workers in Erie Pennsylvania at the meeting protesting the policy of the Tisza government on 25 October 1908 said, "We protest and condemn the conduct of that bad government toward the non-Hungarian nationalities and especially (toward) the Romanian workers... We protest all the repressions of that reactionary government... We send you encouragement to fight on..." (38).

The socialist press in old Romania informed public opinion that upon the request of the Romanians in Chisinau it must intercede in the Duma "on behalf of the 2 million Romanians ... who are not allowed to have Romanian schools and are prevented from holding religious services in their ancentral language" (39).

The militants of the Romanian labor movement realized the importance of informing international public opinion about their historic past, their situation at the time and their resolve to fight by all means and most resolutely for the ideal of unification on a national scale. They set forth their stand on the Romanian people's vital problems at length at international demonstrations organized in Zurich, Vienna, Basel and other major European centers and through the press or directly in conversations with various representatives of political and cultural life in various states. On 27 September 1908 a conference was organized in Vienna of representatives of the oppressed peoples in the Austro-Hungarian Empire, which was attended by George Grigorovici on behalf of the Romanians. In his speech the Romanian delegate said, "I am speaking this time no only as a socialist but particularly as a son of the Romanian people. Nearly all of us Romanians are concerned about the events in Hungary. After all more than 3 million of our blood brothers are living in that country under the yoke of an unprecedented bondage. We Romanians suffer the sad fate of being torn into four parts under four masters and we find this fate hard to endure" (40).

During the discussions at the Socialist Congress in Basel in 1912 the same George Grigorovici greeted the participants in the name of the Romanian proletariat by pointing out the danger that "Romania will be sacrificed to the greed of Austrian or Russian imperialism" (41).

In Paris, Vienna, Berlin, Brussels or various U.S. cities the emigre Romanian socialists, organized in the Group of Romanian Socialist Workers in Paris, the Association of Romanian Workers in Vienna, the Federation of Romanian Socialists in America etc., and the socialist students studying in various European capitals sent messages of encouragement to their oppressed brothers and demonstrated the Romanians' right to national unity and freedom to public opinion in the countries where they were.

The entire proletariat's struggle for national unity, intensified toward the outbreak of World War I, was strongly supported by the permanent and close ties between the workers in Romania and those in the territories under foreign rule.

Those ties, in the form of moral and material support to the workers political and trade organizations in Transylvania, the Banat and Bucovina, mutual participation in various demonstrations organized in old Romania and the provinces under foreign occupation, joint representation of the Romanian proletariat at international socialist congresses and conferences, exchange of delegations, correspondence, socialist literature, the press and orators on 1 May and in electoral campaigns and other political events, were manifested in the formation and application of a uniform operational program. The press organs published in old Romania like VIITORUL SOCIAL or CALENDARUL MUNCII were designed to serve the interests of all Romanian labor. The first issue of the theoretical journal VIITORUL SOCIAL, published in Iasi beginning August 1907 announced that it was to become "the Romanian-language organ of socialists in all countries," recruiting regular contributors in Transylvania, Bucovina and Moldavia between the Prut and the Dniester (42). CALENDARUL MUNCII, intended to serve the movement in Bucovina and Transylvania, was also for such purposes.

Old Romania was also a refuge for its sons who were fleeing the persecution of the Austro-Hungarian and Czarist authorities, and they continued their activity there, maintaining close and regular contacts with the Romanian socialists in the occupied territories, including Tiron Albani, Ioan Cretu, Zamfir Arbore, Nicolae Codreanu et al.

The variety and intensity of the ties between the Romanian proletariat in the oppressed territories and that in old Romania graphically illustrate the workers' national consciousness and their ardent desire to unite all Romanians in one free and independent state. These ties lent an added consistency to the initiatives of the Transylvanian, Bucovinan and Moldavian socialists in defense of the national rights of the Romanian population in the occupied provinces. In 1910 G. Grigorovici, the first Romanian social-democratic deputy in the Parliament in Vienna, succeeded with the aid of the social-democratic parliamentary faction in Vienna in introducing special provisions for Bucovina in the trade treaty with Romania, namely abolition of passports for Romania and lower postal rates for correspondence, newspapers, books and printed matter, in addition to general aids to trade between Austria and Romania. The last of those provisions was to facilitate the cultural exchanges between the Romanians in Bucovina and those in the kingdom.(43).

In the period before the outbreak of World War I the aggravated contradictions among the great European imperialist powers compelled the socialists and the working class in Romania to examine all aspects of the resulting situation clearly and realistically. A 1915 publication stated that it was the proletariat's duty to defend its country against the invaders. "If Romania is threatened by foreign aggression, we socialists will do our duty not with resignation but with the clear consciousness of committing no violation of our principles" (44). This recognized the correctness of wars of national defense and liberation as the only just wars, waged by peoples victimized by aggression or subjugated peoples asserting their desire for national freedom, independence and unity. In summing up the viewpoint of the Romanian socialists, who strongly condemned wars of plunder and invasion, C. Dobrogeanu-Gherea declared, "Social-democracy favors other wars with all energy and resolve, such as wars of liberation, wars of the invaded against the invaders, and civil or revolutionary wars waged by the subjugated and oppressed classes against the oppressors" (45).

Although the clouds of war were gathering and auguring new sufferings for the Romanians, the labor movement did not for a moment cease to affirm its belief in the union of all Romania's sons within the natural borders in the independence and sovereignty of the fatherland. Constantin Dobrogeanu-Gherea wrote, "I found only expressions of feelings everywhere, and especially the desire to unite the country. But there is and can be no question about that. In a country with the misfortune to have part of its body under foreign rule, its unification is a common desire of all citizens (46). In his turn M. Gh. Bujor concluded, "Nations are national and historical frameworks for development of the peoples. An existence of its own has been established within those frameworks for every nation, with its traditions, its spiritual life, its ideals and its civilization as a precious and indispensable element in the concord of general civilization. In this sense the nations are necessary , because under the present circumstances it is only within these frameworks that the peoples can freely and fully develop all their originality and creative power. That is one, but clearly not the only one, of the reasons why social-democracy opposes partition of established countries, fragmentation of peoples and suppression of their national existence" (47).

The outbreak of World War I marked the beginning of more years of suffering for the Romanian people as a whole. For those in old Romania it meant considerably greater fears for the future of the country and for the Romanian nation's independent existence itself. For the Romanians in the conquered provinces it meant the start of a new Calvary, of years of bitter trials and dreadful terror. The peaceful population was to face the violence of gendarmes, staged trials, death sentences or internment in camps. By a mere accusation teachers, priests and men of the most diverse social categories and political convictions could be called traitors and consequently arrested and condemned.*

In August 1916 after 2 years of neutrality the Romanian government joined the Entente, which promised to satisfy the desire for the single Romanian national state to a great extent after the victory. In this way Romania's participation in that war stimulated the masses' struggle for the unity of all Romanians. The socialist movement and the working class in Romania did not identify the imperialistic character of the war waged by the great powers with the Romanian people's historic right to fulfill their national ideal, which was the moral support for the heavy human and material sacrifices made during the war by the Romanian people, who did not enter the armed conflict with intentions of conquest and annexation but out of the desire to fulfill their keen aspirations to unification, freedom and independence. As Nicolae Ceausescu pointed out, "Although World War I was imperialistic, the Romanian people did not participate in it with intentions of conquest and territorial annexation... The Romanian people's keen aspirations to unity were reflected by the political declarations of the time, the massive public demonstrations held throughout the country on that occasion, and especially by the unbounded enthusiasm with which the Romanian troops were welcomed in Transylvania by the masses of the entire population. Many citizens both in contemporary Romania and in Transylvania and Bucovina under Habsburg rule enlisted voluntarily, asking for the opportunity to fight for the cause of the nation as a whole" (48).

In the course of the effort of the entire people, who rose to fight for the defense of the nation's independence and for the union of all Romanians within the same state borders, an outstanding part was played by the heroic Romanian working class under the leadership of its political party. In a moving manifesto of the PSD addressed to the citizens of Bucharest 3 months after Romania entered the war, when a large part of the nation's territory had been occupied by the armies of the Central Powers, an appeal was made to keep calm and remain in place "whatever the consequences of this war," because "our party, which is (a class party) ... will remain in place when misfortune brings about the occupation of our territory by other masters" (49). The Romanian workers and the socialist militants once again showed their great patriotism and profound dedication to the interests of the people and the nation. By fighting in the first lines of the front to defend their ancestral land or by aiding the general effort to supply the front with the necessities, and also by organizing the resistance and keeping up the morale of the population in the occupied territory, the Romanian workers made a valuable contribution to the great battle for national unity and for the freedom and independence of the nation.

The years 1917-1918 marked historic victories for the ideas of freedom and democracy in the world. The last empires in Europe, veritable prisons of the peoples, disappeared and were replaced by new states that strongly asserted their right to a free and independent existence. In noting this process SOCIALISMUL for 17 November 1918 said, "Once there was a Russian Empire! In less than a year all that was more reactionary, more oligarchic and more ugly has collapsed. That which appeared strengthened by the weight of centuries has fallen before the need of change. Peoples numbering hundreds of millions, half of Europe, with aspects of civilization have lent a new color to the state structures by reforming the old forms of government."

The national liberation movement was accordingly amplified and considerably strengthened in the occupied Romanian territories as it received the decisive contribution of the proletariat.

In Moldavia east of the Prut, the first of the Romanian territories long under foreign rule to be united with Romania, the revolutionary and socialist movement played an important part in accomplishing the historic act of 27 March 1918. The composition of the local and regional national committees, and especially that of the National Council as it was on the day of voting on unification with the motherland, emphatically indicated that the representatives of the revolutionary and labor organizations were in a large proportion, for 38 of the 150 delegates represented the councils of peasants, soldiers and workers, the socialist parties and the trade unions (50).

The Romanian socialists in Bucovina, Transylvania and the Banat also made a decisive contribution to the unification. Delegates of the PSD also participated in the congress of the population's representatives in Bucovina that decided to join Romania on 15/28 November 1918.

A telling contribution to the preparation and establishment of Transylvania's union with Romania was made by the Central Romanian National Council, organized on the socialists' initiative and composed equally of six representatives each of the PSD and the PNR /Romanian National Party/ in Transylvania, as follows: Tiron Albani (carpenter), Iosif Jumanca (printer), Ioan Flueras (coachbuilder), Enea Grapini (engineer), Bazilu Surdu (metallurgist) and Iosif Renoiu (metallurgist) on behalf of the PSD, and Iuliu Maniu, Theodor Mihail, Dr Aurel Vlad, Dr Al. Vaida, St. Ciceo-Pop, and Dr Aurel Lazar on behalf of the PNR (51). Throughout Transylvania national guards and councils were formed which included representatives of the working class in most cases.

The formation of the CNRC /Central Romanian National Council/ as an organ representing the interests of the Romanian population as well as a central authority for the efforts toward national emancipation met with the unanimous support of the Transylvanian proletariat (52). Expressing this support, the daily ADEVARUL, the central organ of the PSD in Transylvania, said, "The entire Romanian people are supporting the CNRC. The Romanian workers declare that they are supporting it body and soul and expect it to be up to the national standard of the Romanian people in Hungary and Transylvania and to improve the social position of the Romanian working people and peasantry" (53).

Soon after it was formed the CNRC received dozens of telegrams of affiliation from all corners of Transylvania and the Banat, including those from the social-democratic organizations. The following are a few of the latter:

"Rodna Noua. The Romanian PSD section and the Romanians of Rodna Noua Commune united in the local Romanian National Council are overjoyed to greet the victory of our cause and support the CNRC and its ideas with brotherly love." Signed Dumitru Cotul, secretary.

"Rodna Veche. The Rodna Veche section of the Romanian PSD expressed its devotion to the CNRC in the assembly held today (10 November). Long live the council and Romanian social-democracy." Signed Alex. Cardan, secretary, on behalf of the section.

"Brasov. We belong to the County Romanian National Council. Give us instructions on cooperation with the CNRC" (54). Victor Bratfaleanu, secretary of the local social-democratic organization, signed this telegram.

The CNRC played an important part in mobilizing the revolutionary energies of the working masses in Transylvania and the Banat. The Transylvanian socialists thought the unification with Romanian should be the result not only of the objective laws of development of Romanian society but also of the will of the masses. To this end they proposed consulting the masses "in a referendum by a public vote" (55). Their proposal was accepted. The meeting of the CNRC on the evening of 14 November decided to convene a great assembly of the masses in Transylvania, at which it was decided to unite that historic Romanian province with the motherland.

The Transylvanian socialists' contribution to the historic achievement of 1 December 1918 was also noted on other important levels. Ioan Mihut was assigned the mission of informing the CNRC from Budapest of the developments in Hungary, in order to counteract the attempts to check the Transylvanian Romanians' national effort by force. Iosif Receanu was assigned to report that the Romanian units in Vienna would take the oath of loyalty to the Romanian tricolor, and Ion Flueras was to negotiate with representatives of the Hungarian government to make extra trains available to the delegates who were coming to Alba Iulia (56).

PSD representatives such as Enea Grapini, Iosif Jumanca and Ion Flueras (57) participated along with PNR representatives in the negotiations in Arad with emissaries of the Hungarian government beginning on 13 November 1918 (58). Some PSD members like Iosif Renoiu made an extensive effort to prepare and organize the masses to attend the Alba Iulia Assembly. He organized the Bocsa Romana Romanian National Council, chaired the assemblies to elect the delegates to the great forum of the Romanian population in Transylvania in the communities of Ocna de Fier, Dognecea, Zarnesti and Sebes, and headed the Bocsa delegation to Alba Iulia (59).

Many socialist militants played an important part in organizing the national guards, maintaining order, defending the peaceful population from the Hungarian guards' attacks etc., including the action of Lt Marian Dreghici, chief of the Romanian National Guard in Ocna Mures and a notable member of the PSD section and the trade union in the community, who freed the Cucerdea CFR /Romanian Railroads/ Station and the communities of Vintul de Sus, Aiud and Miraslau, which had been occupied by armed groups of Szeklers to prevent the delegates and masses of Romanians from coming to Alba Iulia. After the fighting was over Lt Dreghici departed at the head of a column of delegates for the citadel of the first Romanian unification (60), which was accomplished in the reign of Mihai Viteazul the Unifier.

A few days before the Great Assembly at Alba Iulia and after the CNRC stated its stand on national-state unity, the Transylvanian social-democrats stated their attitude publicly.

ADEVARUL pointed out, "The Romanian PSD in Hungary and Transylvania is based upon the peoples' right to free self-determination and entirely agrees with the CNRC, which demands complete freedom for the Romanians in former Hungary. We have suffered enough, we have borne the shameful yoke of national slavery for centuries on end, we have been servants of others long enough, we have lived in poverty, ignorance and darkness, and we have laid up enough treasures for others. Therefore we wish to be free at once and we wish to be the sole masters of our fate. Furthermore, unification of all Romanians is one of our most beautiful dreams. We wish to become a great people through unification of all the Romanian lands, to whom all roads to progress and happiness will be open." In this way the labor movement again proved its profound devotion to the principle of self-determination of the peoples and its selfless service to the Romanian people's determined struggle for national-state unity.

On 1 December 1918, before the opening of the Great National Assembly at Alba Iulia, the Transylvanian labor delegates held a conference at which a resolution was proposed on the necessity of achieving the unity of the Romanian people within a free, independent and democratic state. The resolution said that Romanian social-democracy "wishes and even maintains for its part that the entire Romanian people everywhere will form and unite in an independent state wherein they will secure their development and happiness as sons of a single nation through common concentration of all the Romanian intellectual and physical capacities" (61).

In their turn the organized workers in old Romania, on the eve of the historic assembly, made a point of expressing their full support of the great act concluding the process of achieving national-state unity. "Great Romania! Is there anyone who does not wish it? Will there be anyone who rejects it?" SOCIALISMUL, which was being published in Bucharest, quite rightly wondered. It went on to say, "The workers with book learning will swell the ranks (of the Socialist Party -- our note) and the intellectuals .... will disseminate their knowledge to advantage. In a word, new populations steeled in centuries-long struggles for the freedoms and the good life will help to regenerate the people in the motherland" (62).

On 1 December 1918 over 100,000 Romanian citizens, workers, peasants, tradesmen and intellectuals, assembled on the field of Horea and resolved to unite Transylvania with Romania in a unanimous and inspiring decision. The 1,228 delegates from the entire province who were present included 150 representing the Social-Democratic Party, which had about 70,000 members and was the most active force in the struggle for unification. The social-democratic delegates represented the party's central bodies as well as the socialist sections or groups in Arad, Brasov, Deva, Lugoj, Orastie, Rodna Veche, Turda, Timisoara, Sacarimb (63) etc.

The assembly approved the historic Alba Iulia Declaration, drafted by the representatives of all the social-political forces in Transylvania and the Banat, and elected the Grand National Council, composed of 150 members and out of which the Directing Council was formed. Because of their part in accomplishing the historic act at Alba Iulia the social-democrats held important posts in both political bodies, which were to bring Transylvania temporarily to complete economic, administrative and legislative unification with Romania. They had 30 members in the first body and Ioan Fluerras and Iosif Jumanca ranking as ministers in the second one.

At its first meeting, held 2 days after the historic assembly, the Grand National Council sent a telegram to King Ferdinand of Romania saying, among other things, "The national assembly of the Romanians in Transylvania, the Banat and the Hungarian Land (Crisana -- our note) held at Alba Iulia, the glorious citadel of Mihaiu Viteazul, has decreed the unification of his territories with the Kingdom of Romania unanimously and with boundless enthusiasm ... The decision crowns the centuries-long aspirations of the Romanian people" (64).

Romania's unification opened the era of profound structural changes in Romanian society, accelerated its socioeconomic progress and lent more impetus to the political presence of the working masses, who proved increasingly determined under the new historical conditions to solve the basic problems of Romanian society according to their own aims and the major interests of the Romanian nation. The memorable achievement in 1918 represented the will of a nation which had suffered for centuries on end from the aggressive policy of the great empires and which, despite the vicissitudes of time, had kept unchanged its ideal of national unification within the borders of ancient Dacia, free and independent.

The Romanian proletariat clearly expressed its stand on the act of unification as soon as it was accomplished, and on defense of the nation's sovereignty and independence. In the daily SOCIALISMUL's editorial entitled "Unification" on the historic decision at Alba Iulia the socialists in old Romania warmly welcomed the Romanian people's epochal achievement: "On 1 December the Great National Assembly at Alba Iulia proclaimed the merger of the Romanian people in Transylvania, the Banat and the Hungarian Lands in one Romanian state and their union with Romania.

"The resolution approved by the National Assembly proclaims 'complete freedom for all national minorities' as the basic principle of the new Romanian state.

"That freedom is very broad and gives proof that those who have cast off the yoke of foreign oppression do not know how to oppress others in turn ... The new Romanian state is founded on the broadest democratic principles ...

"Today we send our greetings to the workers organized in the new Romanian state across the mountains, calling upon them to unify the Socialist Party in Great Romania.

"The socialist movement must be strengthened and united against the Romanian bourgeoisie's power strengthened by the unification. We intend to form a single socialist Party in the territory from the Dniester to the Tisza" (65).

The organized workers in Transylvania, the Banat, Bucovina and Eastern Moldavia displayed the same patriotic attitude. The Provisional Managing Committee of the SDP in Transylvania, in its official proclamation to the Romanian workers on the second day after the Great Assembly, recalled the cruel lot of the Romanians, who had endured foreign oppression throughout their history, their heroic struggle for unity and independence, and the overwhelming importance of the creation of the single Romanian state to the destiny of the Romanian nation. The proclamation said, "After centuries of national and social enslavement of our people in Transylvania, the Banat and the Hungarian Land, the time for emancipation has arrived. For centuries on end we have been most cruelly oppressed by the Hungarian ruling class. They sought to destroy us. But now those tyrants who dug graves for us have fallen themselves, while we, after barbarous persecution, have steeled our strength and are now stronger and more alert than ever... The whole structure of the old Austro-Hungarian monarchy has now collapsed... and all the peoples hitherto held within that monarchy by the army's power have now become free and independent. The road to self-determination was thus opened to us Romanians, and then the assembly at Alba Iulia, where the representatives of the entire Romanian people in Transylvania, the Banat and Hungary gathered together and resolved to carry out our old ideal, the unification of all Romanians, came as a natural consequence of those events" (66).

In their turn the Bucovinan socialists expressed their full support of the act of unification. In its editorial of 11 January 1919 VORWAERTS ("Foreward"), the central organ of the SDP in Bucovina, concluded that "This unification (of Bucovina with Romania -- our note) is necessary and natural because the national states are indispensable to any further development."

The labor movement in Romania did not confine itself to taking stands or to official declarations concerning the national unity accomplished in 1918. Acting on behalf of harmonious development of the national economy and the internal social-political structures, the labor movement in Romania was constantly on the offensive against all outside threats to Romania's territorial integrity, independence and sovereignty. As the labor organizations pointed out, "Our independence is a sine qua non for our future. That is the supreme reason why Romanian socialism came out at Alba Iulia for the ideal of unifying all Romanians," (67) and they also firmly stated, "We accept no foreign states' interference in our internal affairs..." (68).

The resolution of the Congress of the PSD in Transylvania and the Banat, held on 6 and 7 January 1919, pointed out in this connection that "The Romanian people's unification in an independent state is a historical necessity" (69). Moreover the Provisional Executive Committee of the Socialist Party and the Provisional General Commission for Trade Unions in old Romania pointed out in the Declaration of 13 February 1919, wherein it enthusiastically welcomed the act of unification, the great importance of every nation's unrestricted development to fulfillment of its aspirations to freedom and independence. The Declaration said, "In view of the fact that any exclusive regime discriminating against a race or nation is to the detriment of the masses and restricts their free economic, political and cultural development, the Socialist Party as a representative of those masses is primarily for complete emancipation of the subjugated nations and accordingly for their self-determination" (70).

In rejecting some opinions expressed abroad at the time, especially in Hungary, that in view of the proletarian revolution in Hungary the Transylvanian Romanians had no grounds for unification with bourgeois Romania, the labor organizations pointed out that national unification was a key consideration for the destinies of the Romanians.

In the same connection they combatted the attitude of the Hungarian Austro-Marxists, pointing out that "It is naive to object that we, the Romanians in former Hungary, are uniting with a kingdom... The 'kingdom,' in origin and in principle, is unacceptable to socialism. But as long as there are kingdoms in Europe wherein socialism is living a full life (Belgium, England, Italy and Spain), the Romanian socialists cannot be any more inconsistent than their brothers in Belgium, England, Italy and Spain. And if the democratic Austro-Italian provinces could unite with Italy, why should Romanian socialism in Hungary support the Hungarian historical tradition even on a socialist basis? This single objection is refuted. Of course Romanian socialism has its ideal properly speaking, which it will carry out as soon as it has the necessary strength. But as long as there is a single argument against uniting, and there are thousands of arguments for unification of all Romanians, it is the task of Romanian socialism to contribute without hesitation to achievement of the ideal of unification of all Romanians" (71).

To cooperate with the Romanian diplomats' efforts on behalf of recognition of the plebiscites of 27 March, 24 November and 1 December 1918 by foreign countries, the labor organizations gave a mandate to Ion Flueras to join the Romanian delegation attending the Paris Peace Conference with the specific mission of demonstrating the Romanian nation's consensus on the act of unification, especially from the standpoint of the labor movement's interests. Also on behalf of Transylvanian social-democracy, Emil Isac went abroad with the mission of pleading for the cause of Romanian unity and independence in Berne, Paris and London. Dr Eleonora Rozvan, jointly with Ioan Flueras, was given the mission of holding discussions with the provisional leadership of the Socialist International and with a number of leading representatives of the labor parties in Europe in order to explain the Romanian socialists' attitude toward unification, "to present our (Romania's -- our note) situation to the Socialist International, and to refute the tendentious statements of the Hungarian socialists who tried to defame us at the Berne Conference" (72).

The peace negotiations at Paris were followed very carefully by the whole Romanian labor movement, which wanted state unification to be accompanied by the Romanian people's free development and not by new economic burdens and restrictions. Interest in this problem was reflected in the public discussions carried in the columns of the socialist press. In an editorial entitled "Universal Peace and the Romanian Question," the socialist daily ADEVARUL pointed out the necessity of free development of the Romanian people, who had forged their own destiny with their united forces. But as the said publication said, the way the Paris peace negotiations were going showed that the great powers intended to "exploit the small nations" among other things. It said that "Terms have been set for Romania to pay war damages to the Entente for Transylvania and Bucovina, damages incumbent upon those territories from the dissolved monarchy, as if the people in Transylvania and Bucovina were guilty of starting the war... The gentlemen settling the 'peace' go even further, claiming the small states and especially Romania should give a free hand to the capitalists in the Entente countries to exploit the petroleum, minerals and forests in Romania. In other words, we should allow them to take all the natural resources out of the country to enrich themselves while we sink further into poverty. The Romanian people can accept no such peace terms."

The changes made in the social-political structure of the postwar world and the creation or restoration of some national states (Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Romania) on the ruins of the multinational empires had the immediate effect of making the working masses and especially the proletariat very active in the political arena. Extensive social restructuring took place, the balance of political power shifted, and there was a continuous process of radicalization of the working masses due to the intensified and expanded class contradictions of the first postwar years.

A similar process took place in Romania, where the working class and other exploited social forces wanted the unification of the Romanian state to be accompanied by radical social-political reforms that would lead to improvement of the masses' living and working conditions and to democratization of state activity. Since the bourgeoisie were in control of the Romanian state, they used national unity to consolidate their own class positions, bringing about partial solution of the social problems and aggravating the contradictions between them and the working masses.

But the fact should be noted that the bourgeoisie, even in this situation, continued for a while to play a certain progressive role, particularly in the form of defense of national state unity. As Nicolae Ceausescu points out, "To try to contest the correctness of establishing single national states on the ground that this process went on under bourgeois leadership is to ignore the historical facts, which demonstrate the progressive role performed in a certain historical period by that class in social development and in liquidating the feudal system and the absolutist states.

"Despite their class limitations the bourgeoisie unquestionably played an important part in achieving Romania's national unity and served the objective requirements of historical development. At the same time it should be pointed out that the decisive role in achieving unity was played by the proletariat, who asserted themselves more and more effectively in the political arena of society, by the labor and socialist movement, and by the masses of the peasantry, who associated the unification with the hope of both national and social liberation" (73). In connection with the achievement of the single national state, the stand taken by the working class and the political and occupational labor organizations indicated, as it did at all critical points in the Romanian people's history, complete understanding of the developmental stage reached by Romanian society and the major requirements of Romania's evolution on the path of economic and social-political progress. As long as Romania's conformity to the new historical trends was firmly supported, the struggle for revolutionary reform of Romanian society was of an uncompromising nature, with the sole purpose in the workers' eyes of victory over the ruling classes. The proletariat, whose power and militance had increased rapidly, took the same stands of support of the people's unity and its consolidation as objective factors for the Romanian nation's progress and evolution, but they were firm in the effort to drive the bourgeoisie, whose role was conskdered ended, from power and to construct a society serving the interests and aspirations of the working masses and the progressive development of Romanian society.

In the view of the labor organizations, the national-state unity achieved in 1918 would become permanent only when the proletariat, as representative of the entire Romanian people's interests and aspirations, seized political power and governed the destinies of the Romanian nation.

The resolve with which the working class party acted at the time to solve the major problems of Romanian society also originated to a great extent in its organizing power and its influence upon the masses. It is noteworthy that the very representatives of the authorities at the time openly acknowledged the Socialist Party's power and even entered it on the "list" of government parties. It was a recognition, unprecedented in modern Romanian history, of the labor movement's place and role in Romanian society and of its great and decisive merits in accomplishing the people's unity. As one of the contemporary journalists noted, "We just wish to point out the important conversion that has taken place in the Liberal Party's ranks regarding the important part a socialist party will play in modern Romania's political affairs. The minister of interior himself, in the midst of his political partisans (representatives par excellence of private capital) has acknowledged that the Socialist Party is a government party! If this opinion of his is not an act of snobbery, then it is a striking example of the swift progress of ideas in periods of ferment and change, since the official daily of the Liberal Party often and recently has categorically denied the necessity of class parties" (74).

As the revolutionary process developed, the socialist organizations more and more firmly expressed their wish to unite the whole labor movement in Romania. The conferences of the socialist organizations in Transylvania and the Banat in September 1919 and August 1920 as well as those of the socialist organizations throughout Romania in May and December 1919 were new and important steps toward complete unification of the labor movement in Romania.

The power with which Romanian organized labor acted to centralize the proletarian political and trade movement indicated the same wish to consolidate the single national state and was also the mature and highly responsible reaction of the Romanian proletariat to the achievement at the end of World War I.

Analysis of the general evolution of Romanian society throughout the period between the wars strikingly reveals the important part played by the labor movement in determining united Romania's internal structures, in its all-around and especially socioeconomic progress, and in defense of its independence, sovereignty and integrity.

Once national unity was accomplished it was necessary to consolidate the united Romanian state, and all forces of Romanian society were called upon to do so regardless of their political persuasion or opinions. There were times, as there would also be in the Romanians' battle to defend their own existence, that called for national coherence and coordinated efforts to complete the construction of lasting foundations for Great Romania.

The labor movement's considerable contribution to consolidation of the single Romanian state took the form of exemplary mobilization of the whole proletariat to restore the economy impaired by the war, support of the goverments between the wars in overcoming internal and external difficulties, and firm repulsion of any foreign attempts upon the nation's integrity and sovereignty.

The socialist organizations favored and acted for "national industrial reorganization, employment of all labor forces and factories," bold promotion of technical progress, "production of producer goods and transport means, raw materials and fuel to enhance the legacy that will come to socialist society, solution of the agrarian problem in the spirit of social justice, democratization of politics, and civil rights and freedoms.

The Romanian labor movement's stand is also illustrated by its moderation in criticizing the central political authorities in these times of great stress and constructive effort. In justifying that attitude, the socialist movement pointed out that in case of any other stand "not only the crown but the country itself would suffer, in view of the extremely difficult domestic situation and the future foreign one" (75). The labor organizations commented that this attitude, required to serve the nation, did not exclude opposition to the activity of the bourgeois political parties and their leaders and did not mean abandoning the struggle for revolutionary reform of Romanian society.

Iosif Jumanca took a similar stand when he said, "One thing should be realized. Today things are changing. A new state is being formed here. Any state is born with hardships. It is wrong to think that this critical condition will persist for centuries on end. The Directing Council is well disposed toward us and we should not beat upon an open door with a sledgehammer... Unrestricted agitation is not permissible, although I wish it could be done... We would have anarchy."

In this connection the socialist Leon Gheller's statement about the Romanian proletariat's role takes on the value of a symbol: "You are the only class that bears today on its shoulders and in its spirit all the work and responsibility for the construction of the great and happy Romania of tomorrow" (76).

Being concerned with the nation's economic restoration and acceleration of its socioeconomic progress, the labor movement took a particular interest in this period in better organization of the productive process, its control and management, and in eliminating the disturbances that were interfering with its progress. It is very significant that the workers councils, flexible organizational forms with many functions, were established in this period on the initiative of the masses of workers. These councils were recognized by the managements of some private enterprises and in the negotiations with the state organs.

The formation of the workers councils became coordinated in the first months of 1919, until their operational regulations were drafted in November 1919 by the General Council of Trade Unions in Romania.

Formed in the main enterprises throughout the country, the workers councils played an important role in securing efficient production in both private and state enterprises, a role recognized, moreover, even by the authorities. The workers council of the Ploiesti Orion Refinery, headed by the worker T. Pislaru, had definite functions in the production process and in relations between the workers and the administrative council of the enterprise. As SOCIALISMUL commented, the employers "recognized the workers council as good and necessary and accorded it... the management of the work as well as the power to adjudicate the conflicts that arose without the boss' interference..." The council checked the workers' attendance, sanctioned violations of the work schedule, and judged the quality of the products. The same publication said, "The management no longer levied fines for absenteeism or negligent performance" (77).

T. Pislaru, secretary of the council, was paid by the refinery's administration for performing his functions in that capacity. We consider it indicative of the Romanian labor movement's influence that the secretary of the workers council had an office hung with portraits of Marx, Engels and Gherea in the administration building of the enterprise (78).

The workers councils accordingly reflected the proletariat's direct participation in the entire nation's effort to restore the national economy, which effort was appreciated not only by some private enterprises but also by some state bodies. In the beginning of 1920, as the General Directorate of Railroads announced, a workers council was to be formed in the Ministry of Transportation, to be composed of representatives of the railroad workers, the traffic and technical personnel, and the station chiefs (79).

In the summer of 1920 the matter of the workers councils was also discussed by the governed, which appointed a special commission to study how they were to be "organized by the state" in "all institutions under its administration" (80).

Of course the workers councils' activity was not confined to the foregoing aspect, since they were also workers bodies that instructed the proletariat in matters of production management and organization in order to acquire some experience in that area, particularly necessary when political power was being taken over by the working class. This aspect of the workers councils' activity was well defined by their operational regulations themselves and also by some leading militants of the Socialist Party in various writings.*

The regulations stipulated, "In view of the historic role it is expected to perform in the future as leader of the socialized enterprises, the workers council must take and interest in the progress and development of production in the exploiting enterprises and especially the development and necessity of the mechanization to be introduced and materials necessary to obtain it, reception of the orders, the prices set etc., training of the technical personnel so essential to production, and recruitment for the organization of technical personnel from the present managements of the enterprises such as engineers, chemists, managers... craftsmen etc." (81).

Judging by the general activity of the working class party as a political unit representative of the major interests and aspirations of the whole Romanian nation, we must regard as quite realistic the opinion of the socialist militant Ion Sion, expressed in Moreni at the celebration of 1 May 1920 by the local trade union of petroleum workers: "... the Socialist Party's struggle is in the interest of the Nation" (82).

Romania's economic recovery in a relatively short time (1918-1924), surpassing the prewar levels of industrial and agricultural output in the main parameters beginning in 1924, was solely the result of the concerted effort of the proletariat and the peasant masses, who overlooked their own dissatisfactions caused by shortages and privations and fully committed themselves to the united Romanian nation's effort to build lasting foundations for the fatherland. This merit was recognized, evidently as far as the ruling classes could do so, both by investing some leading militants of the Socialist Party with important political and administrative positions and by due public commendations of some politicians of the time. Thus Ioan Flueras and Iosif Jumanca performed their activities during 1918 and 1919 as ministers on the Directing Council in Transylvania. It is appropriate to point out both socialist ministers' important contribution to the solution of many problems in the fields of social welfare and industry while they were on the Directing Council (83).

Some socialists like Oberlaender and T. Rozvan were communal councilors taking an active part in discussion and solution of important problems concerning the respective communities (in this case Cernauti) (84).

During these years the political party of the working class logged a spectacular gain in the number of seats obtained in the legislative assemblies. In the parliamentary elections of 1919 and 1920 the Socialist Party obtained seven deputy seats and one senatorial seat and 20 deputy seats and three senatorial seats respectively.

The Socialist Party was and appeared as a powerful political force in postwar Romanian society, of which the rulers of the time took some account. The proposal of the head of the government formed by the People's Party, General Averescu, that the Socialist Party designate a representative to hold a ministerial portfolio is a noteworthy fact indicative of this point.(85).

Committed to the Romanian people's constructive effort to consolidate the united state, the labor movement promoted with the same consistency relations with international labor organizations and proletarian parties abroad, basing them on the principles of respect for national independence and sovereignty as well as those of independent organization and political activity of the party of the working class in Romania.

Relations with the Comintern, established in the formative stage of that international labor organization, were an important aspect in this connection and one that also brings out the Romanian labor movement's stand on the matter of the national-state unification in 1918 and on Romania's independence and sovereignty. Overlooking some manifestations that indicated from the very start that the Comintern took a peculiar view of its connections with the international communist and revolutionary movement, the Socialist Party in Romania openly and emphatically expressed its decision to join that international workers forum.

Events in 1920, in connection with relations with the Comintern especially, strikingly indicated the Romanian revolutionaries' patriotic position. As we know, in the summer of 1920 a delegation of Romanian socialists composed Gh. Cristescu, C. Popovici, E. Rozvan, I. Flueras, Al. Dobrogeanu-Gherea and D. Fabian visited Soviet Russia and held discussions with leaders of the Soviet State and members of the Executive Committee of the Comintern.

Before they left Romania some members of the delegation were asked by representatives of the Romanian government to inquire of the Soviet authorities about the national treasure in Moscow and the situation of the Romanian prisoners in Russia.

The Romanian socialists held discussions in Moscow with representatives of the Comintern and in Kharkov with Cristian Racovski, then people's commissar for the Ukraine. After a constructive phase the discussions took an unfavorable turn that led to their interruption and Ion Flueras' departure from Soviet Russia.

The Comintern representatives accused the Romanian socialists of supporting the process of national-state unification, calling it "annexation" of "foreign" territories. They also leveled bitter reproaches at the Transylvanian socialists especially for supporting the consolidation of the single Romanian state, interpreting their presence in the Grand National Council formed at Alba Iulia and in the Directing Council in Transylvania as "collaboration" with the bourgeoisie and abandonment of the principles of the class struggle. In connection with this point, Bukharin, a representative of the Comintern leadership who was holding discussions with the delegation of Romanian socialists, stated the following in the meeting on 24 November 1920: "We received the Romanian delegation at the previous meeting with us, and among the representatives were also those from Transylvania. We asked them various questions, and among others some about the reasons that led them to take part in the government. Today we received a declaration from Mr Flueras wherein he not only did not repent of his behavior but also brought quite scandalous reasons for this behavior.

We know that Mr Flueras' behavior is shameless and therefore we suggest that Mr Flueras leave the hall (that is, the meeting)" (86).

Gh. Cristescu, C. Popovici and I. Flueras replied that the Romanian socialists had always supported the Romanian people's struggle for national unity and independence. In their view and in the view of the whole Romanian labor movement the national-state unity achieved in 1918 was the work of the entire people, which served to the greatest extent the vital necessities of their free and independent development.

Because the process of consolidating the single Romanian state called for concentration of the nation's energies, in October 1920 the General Council of the Socialist Party and the Trade Unions unanimously decided to unify the labor movement on a national scale.

The labor movement's ideological and organizational activity in 1918-1921, with the main purpose of reorganizing the working class party, made it possible for an event of profound significance for the destinies of the proletariat and the entire people to take place at the historic Socialist Party Congress in May 1921, for the whole party to become the Socialist-Communist Party, which name it bore until the Second Congress in October 1922. This significant moment marked the rise of the labor movement to a new and qualitatively higher level. As SOCIALISMUL for 9 May 1921 pointed out, "As successors of the old Socialist Party, we the Communist Party are beginning to organize and fight with all the fund of experience and lessons of a noble past."

The RCP embodied the Romanian people's interests and aspirations on a higher level. From the first moment of reorganizing the Socialist Party into the Communist Party, the communists took a broad view of the mission with which history had entrusted them. SOCIALISMUL for 9 May 1921 said, "Mankind expects much more of us than economic and political emancipation. It expects us to set it an example of truly human morality." It went on to point out that the RCP policy would meet "not only the requirements of the time but the very needs and aspirations of the people."

The RCP, the direct successor of the party of the working class formed in 1893, led the Romanian people's struggle for social liberation on to a higher level and tried selflessly to carry out the aim of revolutionary reform of Romanian society in the interest of the many (87). After the Great Congress of May 1921, which manifested the will of the Romanian working class to lend new impetus to the struggle for acquisition of political power by the proletariat and construction of socialist and communist society, the revolutionary organizations made a vast and tireless effort to mobilize the masses for the struggle against the ruling classes and for defense of the nation's independence, sovereignty and integrity.

IMPORTANCE OF TECHNICAL EDUCATION FOR ALL CITIZENS

Bucharest ERA SOCIALISTA in Romanian No 20, 20 Oct 81 pp 8-10

/Article by Prof Dr Eng Marin Radoi, deputy minister of education and instruction: "Technical Education"; passages enclosed in slantlines printed in italics/

/Text/ The evolution of modern society and the very fast rate of development of science and technology require the reevaluation and defining of the concept of education in a new view. Until not long ago, one who had a basic minimum of knowledge about world literature, was able to recite--sometimes without understanding fully--from the verses of the world's great poets, was familiar with a few musical works and had had the chance to admire one or more of the masterpieces of plastic art and in the field of architecture was considered an educated man. Under these conditions, education's characteristic dimension referred almost exclusively to the emotional area, and the access to such education had a unilateral and, mostly, limited character.

The strong development of the production forces, especially in recent decades, marked considerable progress. The output of modern machines and installations increased the people's productive power to proportions that sometimes enter the realm of the fantastic. All these things led to deep changes in the economic structure and necessitated requirements regarding the quality of the work force and the general level of education. With such a high degree of development of the production forces, it became possible for the most imposing revolution in science and technology in mankind's millennia-long history to appear in the middle of the 20th century.

At present, the concept of education has greatly expanded its sphere of inclusion from a quantitative viewpoint, as well as a qualitative one, requiring not only the memorization of data that refer to history and literature but also concrete, practical actions, connected with the production of material assets. It could be said that knowledge of the modern discoveries of science and the ability of the people to use them practically have come to the forefront. In other words, education means now, in particular, the capacity to act in accordance with the requirements of modern scientific, technical and cultural progress. It has thus become possible for us to speak, more than ever, of technical education in its capacity of an essential component of education, as a basic requirement of the training of the man of our times and as a leading concern of the school and of other connected fields.

The Concept of Technical Education and Creativity

There is usually confusion in establishing the sphere of inclusion of the concept of technical education, it being limited--most of the time--to the acquisition of skills that refer exclusively to individual training. But it cannot be asserted that a good technician, regardless of what field, capable of rapidly and accurately diagnosing any defect in technical apparatus, "commands" a technical education. Especially as many people in very different specialties can also have skills or mere technical abilities. In the era of the metasciences, when the boundaries of the classic disciplines have long since been shattered, the shape and composition of technical education are acquiring wholly new dimensions, going categorically beyond what is usually meant by "technical knowledge."

Technical education implies an understanding of the basic principles of the natural sciences and technology and of the mechanisms on which the basic processes of life are based. We can say that a television repairman who mechanically performs high-quality current repairs without knowing the principles that govern the transmission of the picture by waves has good professional qualifications, that he has technical /knowledge/, but he does not have a technical /education/ in the true sense of the word. Which does not mean that there are not also repairmen who have a technical education. The essential difference between the two categories of repairmen is that while the former performs, as a rule, mechanical operations that are repeated and, after a time, become a trade, the latter--even in the case of performing the same operations--relies on a scientific understanding of the mechanism and its operating diagram. It can be said that /creativity/, the capacity to know the scientific operating mechanism and to take the respective diagram further, constitutes the essential dividing line between technical knowledge and technical education.

The importance of scientific and technical gains and the necessity of consciously using them are pointed out in our party's documents. This explains the special accent that is now being put on thoroughly mastering the basic disciplines that are taught in school, as well as the constant concern of the party and state for improving the training of the work force.

Technical education cannot be reduced to mere storage of knowledge, gathered over time, in an arithmetic fashion. Its true sense consists of the utilization, in the work process, of the laws that govern one or another of the branches of science, the use of them in a creative manner, transforming the knowledge and technical education from a latent state into an active state. Life demonstrates that the technical education that remains mere inert "baggage," a "stock" of technical knowledge without the proper practical utility, lacks any value.

The rapid evolution of science and technology and the social and economic implications of their use in various countries are strikingly posing new problems, problems that the concept of education did not include at all or almost at all in the past. Of them, the problems of ecology, of environmental preservation and conservation, and knowledge about the technologies of the various branches of production can be mentioned. In a broader sense, under the conditions in which, first and foremost, the problems of turning to a new, higher quality in all fields are being posed in our country, the concept of technical education includes--necessarily--knowledge connected with the laws of rapid growth in labor productivity and economic efficiency. Romania's predominantly intensive development in the 1981-1985 5-year period requires--as Comrade Nicolae Ceausescu pointed out at the Second Congress of Working People's Councils--the people who participate in the production of material assets to have not mere technical knowledge, but a high-level technical and economic education.

The information explosion, characteristic of each branch of the economy, and the new discoveries that are arising at very small intervals of time--lately at intervals even smaller than a year--require the continual maintenance and the renewal of the technical education. The cultivation of the spirit of creativity, the only thing able to transform the /potential/ technical education into an /active/ technical education, useful to society, has a very important role in this regard. In the book "The Sociology of Science," G. N. Volkov states that "modern production is acquiring such a character that it needs not so much the mechanical efforts of muscles as the creative efforts of man." And he continues by pointing out that in the process of improving the work force "the knowledge gained by man represents an accumulated energy of such a potential that it is not comparable to any of the energy forces already known, since this knowledge, this developed creative capacity of man, tames new forces of nature and puts them at the service of man and society."

The Creation of the Attitudes of the Mind and of the Whole Human Personality for Technology

Although there is a great variety of educational systems, sometimes with radical differences from one country to another--depending on the degree of economic development and their social system--their concern for achieving a suitable technical education constitutes a common trait. Such trends and concerns are connected with the necessity of utilizing the immense possibilities opened up by the scientific and technical revolution and with the imperatives of intensive economic development and of growth in economic efficiency.

The law on education and instruction in our country stresses, among the general principles on which school is based, the requirement of providing in education of all grades "a high level of scientific, technical and cultural training, polyqualification and the training of the pupils and students in broad lines, so that after graduation they may be rapidly and efficiently integrated into the production process and into social activity, may fulfill in the best way the obligations that devolve upon them and, when necessary, can go from one specialty or activity to another."

In the view of our party and state, technical education constitutes an essential component of education, of the training of personnel with a broad makeup, in close agreement with the requirements for the social and economic progress of the country. The technical education of the generations in the making is conceived in close connection with the requirements for the strong affirmation of the scientific and technical revolution in our country, with the evolution of the training of the work force. The school, regardless of the branch for which the young people are being trained, offers--mandatorily--to all pupils and students the same volume of knowledge belonging to the basic disciplines (mathematics, physics, chemistry, biology).

The structural changes in Romanian education in recent years have had as a basic coordinate its integration with production and scientific research, this also being an essential aspect of the formation of technical education. There is thus being accented all the more the obligation of the school to provide for the scientific and technical education of the young person, the acquisition by him of the skills and the inclination to work in productive activity, developing his creative spirit, his enthusiasm for the new, so that, after finishing his studies, he can be rapidly integrated into the activity of production and of scientific and technological research. Only by having such training will the future graduates have the capacity to use well the modern technology in the economy's possession and to themselves contribute to the development of science and technology. Within the framework of the same requirements, our education of all grades is oriented in the direction of supplying the pupils and students with sound knowledge in the field of the economic sciences, of the scientific management and organization of production and labor, with a view to their active participation in the fulfillment of the economic and social tasks, in the continual growth of efficiency in all sectors of activity, in the whole work of multilateral development of our socialist society.

These orientations are part of the unitary, modern and prospective view promoted by our party, a view whereby society's development on the whole is indissolubly conditioned by the degree of instruction and education of each working person. From this come the major significance that technical education has and the extremely important role of the school in achieving it, taking into account the requirements of the modern era, the evolution of scientific and technical progress. It has become almost an axiom that the man of today can no longer live without technology. His world means nature augmented by his own creations, whose efficiency imposes a radical restructuring on man's personality, his psychology and intellectual activities, even his moral universe. From all these things there follows the immense importance of the effort of training whereby man must always be oriented with his face toward the future.

The current meaning of the word "technology" refers to the range of material means and engineering processes and to the aggregate of knowledge and action whereby man uses and adapts his environment and the energies that it contains. Technical education involves not only concrete knowledge of these elements but also, in a broader sense, the creation of the attitudes of the mind and of the whole personality of man for the use of technology.

No one can know everything nowadays. But what we can obtain through the educational process, in its entirety, is the orientation of the young person toward the rational use of all his abilities with maximum effects, a programmed mobility of his mind, which must be trained to learn continually. Mircea Malita spoke somewhere about "the learning of learning," distinguishing it from learning pure and simple. By learning we would be dealing just with an invariable transmission of knowledge taken from mankind's preexisting stock, while "the learning of learning" means a special faculty of the human mind--namely that of devising new knowledge and of preparing for circumstances that the past has not yet known.

The leap that man's personality must make is perhaps nowhere more evident than in the field of technical education. While modeling, for instance, is one of the most efficient means of knowledge nowadays, continually pushing back the limits of the known universe, basing its efficiency precisely on the rigors imposed by research activity, we must recognize in technical education an essential function in the very understanding of the world. Can current research "techniques"--true torches thrown into the unknown in order to illuminate it and bring it closer to us--really be separated from the noble process itself of knowledge, the one that provides dignity to the "thinking reed," as a famous French philosopher said of man?

Technology is now a major field of knowledge itself, a form of action on the environment that reflects social man's whole personality, his strivings and aspirations and his moral and spiritual universe. If that optimistic energy about which Tudor Vianu spoke is the basis for all cultural creation, how can we really conceive of technology other than in the form of an extension of the will that arises from the belief in the possibility of attaining man's great goals.

The overcoming by man of the state of ignorance and of overestimation of the forces of nature constitutes the general sense of these changes that technical education is producing. The multilaterally developed socialist society that we are forging in our country is creating premises for the full affirmation of man's creative powers, in which technical education participates essentially, along with and in close connection with the political and ideological education of the man of tomorrow.

The Dissemination of Technical Education and the Echoes of a False Antinomy

The school represents the main means of formation and dissemination of technical education. It is meant to contribute to the training of the pupil to that level that permits the understanding by him of the intrinsic connection that exists between the basic principles of the modern sciences and the practical requirements.

The formation of creative thinking is a leading concern of the school with regard to the achievement of technical education. It is no secret to anyone that one of the gaps in our education is that it often overuses memorization and the system of one-way transmission of knowledge. Instead of being a true research laboratory where the young person himself comes to discover the basic principles of science and its effects on practical, production activity, the school is limited to the mere repetition of principles and knowledge.

The performance of the activity in laboratory classes is sometimes understood simplistically as the mechanical repetition of overly familiar work, instead of these classes being devoted to an experimental and theoretical investigation, through concentrated, fascinating activity, which would be based on the concern for combining the physical and intellectual capacities of the young person. In view of these shortcomings and the requirements for the formation of technical education, the teacher in the school of today must not limit himself to the transmission of information, becauses this transforms the pupil into a mere "memorization device." As a result, along with the problem of continually improving and adequating the school plans, programs and textbooks, the concerns for improving the teaching technology, the methodology and methods of teaching, must be increased considerably.

The dissemination of technical education is not limited just to the school. Simultaneously, the press, radio, television, the other mass media and the specialized periodicals offer a wide range of technical ideas that are of use to the amateur, as well as the professional. There is also a wide museum network, which, especially through the museums with a technical character, helps to form the technical education of the wide masses of working people, eager to know the evolution of the creative thinking of the human genius, the way in which various apparatus, instruments and machines were developed, from their primitive form to the most modern types that current technology is making available.

While arguing for a high-value technical education, widely disseminated among the young people and the other strata of working people, we do not underrate the important role that goes to humanistic education, capable of helping to developing thinking, imagination, to form the taste for beauty, the enthusiasm for the new. It must be recognized that the echoes of a false antinomy between the civilizing functions of technology and the moral universe of humanistic education sometimes persist in many of the discussions of the experts in the past and in the present. Nowadays, the condemnation of technology has in view, often justifiably, the danger of an ecological disaster. It is pointed out that the exacerbation of the consumptions and the aggression against the environment will lead to devastation of the planet, which will make impossible the development of a harmonious life in accordance with man's aspirations. The contradiction is false, in the final analysis, since it opposes values and aspirations that should be harmonized in man's personality.

From a social viewpoint too, we sometimes note the polarization of the individuals educated, there being at one end of the spectrum the so-called "technical intelligentsia and at the other end the formula intellectuals--let us call it "education in general." Of course, one cannot ignore the necessity of specialization in today's society, with an electronics expert or an atomic researcher of high qualifications being able to isolate himself in his field, which is hardly accessible to a wider stratum of intellectuals. Somewhat similarly, the very elaborate formulations in today's artistic and cultural life sometimes take the form of an obsession with the language, hard to achieve in a life that is not devoted exclusively to these concerns. But such realities must not stop us from seeking to form a man with a harmonious personality, able to get from the humanistic field all the elements of intuition and imagination that he needs and, at the same time, to mold a consciousness imbued with the abstract thinking and the modes of approach to reality characteristic of current science and technology.

The problems that are seen thus entail a total revision of the educational perspective in school in general and all the more in higher education. Today's education is primarily formative and orientative, in contrast to that in the past, which had an additive character. From the current viewpoint, the word that defines our view about school is "do," without opposing it, as Gain Carlo Sacchi said, to "know." It is a question of learning through practical activity and work.

The question could naturally be posed: What indeed is the "strict" field of "technical education" and where does "professional education" begin? Of course, not only in the present framework but also in general, it would be hard to give an exact definition that would set the strict boundaries between the two concepts. This is especially because we are now witnessing a great diversification of the professions, a marked rise in the interpenetration of the various professions and scientific disciplines. However, it is beyond any doubt that through professional education the characteristic traits of technical education in a given field of concerns increase.

Technical education, professional education and humanistic education are, in fact, components of general education. Their participation, to a greater or lesser extent, in general education depends on the concerns, the profession, the attitudes and aptitudes of each. The specialist of today, trained in the school of work, is a basic element in a vast tableau of our socialist culture, a man capable of dreaming and thinking boldly, armed with the poet's imagination and the mathematician's abstract tools--if we can express ourselves thus--capable of creatively applying them in practice.

SARAJEVO LC DISCUSSES CRITICS OF SELF-MANAGEMENT

Sarajevo OSLOBODJENJE in Serbo-Croatian 4 Dec 81 p 7

/Article by A. Nuhefendic/

/Text/ The discussion of public criticism of socialist self-management held on 3 December 1981 in Sarajevo had the initial aim of deepening the theoretical points of departure that have already been formulated, but it can also be regarded as a step forward in the development of concrete aspects of public criticism today.

It would be difficult, if not impossible, to expect an author to present a comprehensive and exhaustive summary of the broad, complex theme indicated. Time alone will tell the degree to which that was achieved by the participants in yesterday's meeting, which included numerous distinguished cultural, public and sociopolitical figures. Yet it is already clear that in their presentations they fulfilled some of the expectations of the organizers, the "Veljko Vlahovic" Marxist study center of the LCY central committee of Bosnia and Hercegovina, and the "Djuro Pucar Stari" Marxist study center of the Sarajevo city LC conference. Specifically, the debate contributed to a deepening and illumination of the ideas and questions that, to a certain degree, were determined at the conference held in Sarajevo last year on the theme "Marxist Criticism as Cultural Creativity." Yet a deeper consideration of the basic hypotheses of public criticism and a critical consciousness, in the words of Hamdija Pozderac, a member of the LCY Central Committee Presidium and president of the Marxist Study Center of the Bosnia and Hercegovina LC Central Committee, requires a status in contemporary social criticism here in Yugoslavia that would also point to rather heterogeneous ideological and political positions that form their basis and their point of departure.

Criticism As It Is

The keynote speaker, Dr Arif Tanovic, president of the Sarajevo LC city conference, specified that under the concept of public criticism in socialist self-management we can presuppose that we are talking about Yugoslav criticism in our society and at the historical moment in which we live. He went on to cite three types of public criticism: inherent socialist self-management criticism, and antagonistic bureaucratic-centralist and bourgeois-nationalist criticism. He also responded to the question concerning the new-left and anarcho-liberal viewpoints, and stressed that he agrees with those who assert that the so-called ultra-left here in Yugoslavia has compromised itself with its radicalism, and very few people now believe that it represents any progressive leftist ideas. Rather, it is disintegrating into either dogmatic bureaucratic viewpoints, which are primarily centralistic and statist, i.e., hegemonistic, or else bourgeois liberal tendencies.

The keynote speaker believes that in their ideological resistance to the anti-self-management front, public criticism by the progressive forces of our society must pay close attention to avoiding the stifling of our freedom of criticism. In that regard, he reminded the audience that Yugoslav society has proclaimed and promoted the principle that knowledge is its own judge, that the ideological battle should be conducted using ideological means, that in the struggle of opinion the argument has the predominant strength, and that revolutionary practice is the criterium of truth.

In speaking about the very prevalent criticism of the lack of consistency of social agencies and individuals in implementing politics that have been adopted, Dr Tanovic stressed that this criticism is certainly justified, for it is an expression of socialist concern for the self-management progress of the society. In that criticism, however, he believes that it is relatively easy to recognize well-intentioned and malevolent critics, to distinguish subjective and objective, concerned and malicious ones. Such varying tones show up in some media, which, in his words, claim to be serving socialist self-management.

The introductory presentation also touched on Yugoslav public criticism which clearly contained the method of bourgeois positivism, the cataloging of negative facts, actually consciously selected data that, when ordered on the basis of a previously determined concept, are designed to give a particular impression. This process gives an illusion of objectivity, accuracy and scientific approach. That type of criticism does not go beyond the surface, does not seek causes, objective conditions or principles, or reveal real possibilities for progressive actions. Dr Tanovic stressed that instead of this positivistic objectivism, we need scientifically objective, materialistic, dialectical, and thus Marxist, analysis of actual situations, and long-range projections of development, elaborations that take into account world trends and Yugoslav objective and subjective possibilities.

Lack of Conflict and Generality

Fuad Muhic focused his presentation on the period after Tito's death, and on certain opinions that he regards as unavoidable when we consider this topic. He spoke about tendencies that he regards to be similar to those of the time of ideological liberalism, e.g., tendencies that sought legalization as partners with LCY policies, so that thereby they could utilize certain mass communication media. Within the framework of this type of ideological liberalism, various forms of the domestic political underground tried their luck. That underground, which was suppressed, is now trying to achieve a legal expression, and its appearance can be perceived in some issues of certain magazines. Muhic therefore asks the question as to whether a portion of the popular press has not avoided the control of LCY policy.

For a time after Tito's death, the ideological situation in Bosnia and Hercegovina was favorable, but for some time there has been a feeling that certain factions in other environments are working intensively to undermine the situation in Bosnia and Hercegovina from within. Muhic specified the groups about which he was talking by citing the publication KNJIZEVNA REC (The Literary Word), which has published articles by individuals who, in Muhic's words, are nothing more than "intellectual filth."

Miodrag Bogicevic spoke about the lack of conflict and the generality of public criticism as one of the serious obstacles in the contemporary critical situation.

In his words, this situation leads to ambiguity, lack of principle and ineffectiveness of criticism. He also believes that explicity of public criticism in self-management under conditions of collective labor and the delegate system of decisionmaking is not really simple to achieve, for there are many opportunities to paralyze personal responsibility by appealing to formalistic decisions or generalized mechanisms that protect the phenomenon being criticized. This makes public criticism more difficult, so that the person who comes forward with criticism somehow puts himself into the position of being accused of opposing the social system, or some segment of it.

Joco Marjanovic spoke about those who recently have expressed positions that we need public criticism that includes discussions, dialogues and polemics without any taboo themes. They refer to the LCY Program, the Yugoslav Constitution and other documents, and speak of pluralism and varying interests, while forgetting the fact that Kardelj clearly and unambiguously stressed that the pluralism referred to involves a multitude of socialist self-management interests. Marjanovic also presented his estimate of the actual definitions and content of those dialogues and polemics, that is, of public criticism. Specifically, he believes that many of them have nothing in common with the struggle of opinions, with real criticism in socialist self-management. In that kind of criticism, even though the persons involved swear that they are speaking from positions supporting the interests of the working people and citizenry, personal motives and interests dominate, along with various forms of posturing and well known dogmatic and liberal appeals to the phantoms of the past.

HANDLING OF YOUTH FEDERATION OFFICIALS BEING QUESTIONED

[Article by Veselin R. Todorovic: "The New Principles of the Old Structure"]

[Text] The number of youth officials did not decrease when the principle of collective work was adopted in the SSO [Socialist Youth League]. Perhaps because from time to time critical assessments have revived concerning professionalization, privileges and behavior of youth officials. It was all favored by the fact that the Conference of the SSO of Yugoslavia has not yet come before the public with the precise number of professional youth officials and at least the principal indicators of their (un)privileged status.

According to an analysis made in the republic conference just recently, there are 371 persons with positions in the SSO of Serbia. Of them 150 are professionals, 55 are appointed and 166 are administrative and technical personnel and other personnel.

All the chairmen and secretaries of the 118 opstina conferences hold those posts as professionals and receive the officeholder's supplement except in Cicevac, Bosilegrad, Krupanj, Veliko Gradiste and Rekovac. In 16 opstina committees of the SSO the chairmen have only the officeholder's supplement. In 67 opstina conferences the chairman is a professional, and in another 19 the secretary is as well. The opstina conferences of the SSO in Nis, Dimitrovgrad and Babusnica have a salaried member of the presidium. In Nis and Palilula the opstina conferences each have two specialized political workers, and another 17 opstina conferences each have one.

Administrative and other functions are performed by 92 persons on the staffs of 52 opstina committees of the SSO. The Stari Grad Opstina Conference of the SSO has a staff of six performing these tasks, the opstina conferences of the SSO in Pirot and Sabac each have five, Novi Beograd and Kragujevac each have four, and so on. There are 66 opstina conferences of the SSO which do not have any.

The chairman and secretary are professionally employed in all interopstina conferences and in the city conference.

The republic conference of the SSO has a staff of 79: 12 professional political officeholders, 28 appointees and 39 members of administrative and other personnel.

Income of Youth Federation Officials

A comparison of the data confirms that since 1979 there has been a quite considerable restructuring in the SSO of Serbia.

What truth about the (un)privileged status of youth federation officials do the most recent data disclose?

The average personal income of an SSO opstina conference chairman in the republic proper is 13,631 dinars, and that of a chairman of an interopstina conference or the city conference of the SSO is 16,865 dinars. The president of the SSO of Serbia earns 19,594 dinars a month, and the secretary of the presidium 18,967 dinars. The work of members of the presidium and of chairmen of commissions of the SSO republic conference is valued at 16,273 dinars, while department heads of the SSO republic conference, the ORA [Youth Labor Brigade Program] secretary and the editor-in-chief and managing editor of OMLADINSKE NOVINE receive 16,815 dinars.

"By contrast with the earnings of officials in other sociopolitical organizations, it is nonsense to proclaim the earnings of professionals in the SSO excessive and to create a sensation of it. However, by comparison with average earnings in production and with the earnings of young people in general, those earnings are higher than they should be," says Nebojsa Rodic, president of the material and financial commission of the Presidium of the Serbian Republic Conference of the SSO. "However, that is not always the case," he adds. "In the organization of associated labor I came from I had a higher personal income than here."

Housing, Cars, Entertainment....

According to the most recent data, over the last 7 years 50 housing units have been allocated by organs of the SSO of Serbia: 24 to SSO officials, 17 to appointees and 9 to people employed in work communities; opstina conferences have allocated 19 housing units, interopstina conferences 5 and the city conference 1. The republic conference has provided 4 housing units to its elected officials, 17 to appointees and 5 to persons employed in the work community. The executive council or other republic bodies have provided housing for seven officials of the republic conference of the SSO (usually the chairman). In addition, the republic conference has furnished part of the financing for resolving the housing problem of seven other of its professionals, one appointee and five members of the work community.

"In almost all cases the housing has been allocated only at the end of the term of office. While they are working in the republic conference, the professionals as a rule are housed privately or in the residence hotel for unmarried persons," Rodic said.

Organs of the SSO of Serbia possess 46 automobiles. Opstina conferences use 23 of these (the Cukarica Opstina Conference of the SSO even has 3 cars), interopstina conferences 10 and the city conference of the SSO 1. Most of these are Zastava cars. But the republic conference also has a 1981 Ford Commodore, two Fiat 132's, two Ladas and one Zastava 750.

No one in the conference (including the chairman) has the right to submit for official expenses bills for drinks and lunches or taxi fares, nor does any have a separate expense account.

Official Position as a Ticket to a Better Life

Youth federation officials are also among those reluctant to return to their native place and to the job they held when elected. Many succeed, and they say good-bye to their previous worker occupation once and for all. This reinforces assertion about their "promotion through politics." Since the 1-year term of office has been in effect, the "creation" of youth federation chairmen has been growing, and this is in inverse proportion to the opportunity for advancement. What do the most recent figures confirm?

Of the 96 youth federation chairmen last year in opstinas (for which the republic conference of the SSO has figures) 37 returned to the job they held before election, 2 obtained a better job in the same organization of associated labor and 10 moved to another work organization (4 of them to a supervisory position). Another 12 were elected to a new position of leadership in the SSO, and 3 chairmen of opstina conferences of the SSO were elected to a position of leadership in some other sociopolitical organization. Three continued working in the SSO as administrative personnel or as political specialists.

The chairmen and secretaries of all interopstina conferences and the city conference were professionals during the last term of office. Where are they now? Four have returned to their "native" organization of associated labor (but two of them to better jobs). Two entered associated labor for an indefinite period for the first time, and one of them immediately became a supervisor. Five moved to another "firm"--two to become supervisors. Five moved up in the Socialist Youth League.

The Higher Position, the Better the Opportunity

Of the 13 professionals employed last year in the republic conference of the SSO, 3 are still in the conference now, 2 hold other positions in the SSO, 2 have become directors, 1 is in an economic organization, 1 in the Trade Union Federation of Serbia, 1 in the Serbian Youth Vacation Program, 1 in the armed forces, 1 is unemployed and 1 is receiving a student scholarship.

Yet comparisons with the way things were done not so very long ago confirm that an ever increasing number of youth officials are loyal to their public commitment and are returning to the places where they were when elected to the new office. However, not even the "institution" of the 1-year term of office has yet "shaken" the rule that a high position in the SSO is also a high springboard to, say, a director's position or some other position in the nonproductive, usually political, "structure."

Those we talked to also indicate that the distorted practice of paying "personal incomes" to youth officials at the end of their term of office should be done away with. In the republic conference this is done for years back. At present two elected and three appointed persons are receiving pay on that basis (a former secretary of the SSO republic conference has also been receiving pay for 5 years now).

"There should not be any former officials in the youth organization waiting for assignment, people who, supposedly because of their service and distinguished political work in the past, are receiving high salaries and thereby confidently confirming their privileged status. A professional position in the SSO, as elsewhere, must not be a pass that leads directly to an easy and prestigious life," Rodic believes. After a fierce debate the presidium of the SSO republic conference was categorical at its last meeting: beginning 1 December of this year not a single dinar will be paid to anyone on that basis.

IGNORANCE OF LAW CALLED RESPONSIBLE FOR VIOLATIONS

Tirana ZERI I POPULLIT in Albanian 11 Dec 81 p 2

[Article by Aranit Cela, chairman of the Supreme Court: "The Laws of the State Should Be Known Better and Better by the Working Masses"]

[Excerpts] At the 8th party congress Comrade Enver stressed that the knowledge and implementation of the laws is a decisive condition for the activity of the state organs and of the masses of people to develop on the straight road and to be successful. It is precisely the great care of the party and its correct line which have made Albania a state with a strong juridical system, where this state organ is obliged to execute the laws of the state and every citizen is certain that no one will violate his rights. There is no country, no state in the world which has such a strong juridical system, where the laws of the state express the will of the working class and of the other working masses, where the laws are executed with full force, in everyday life.

In our country, a healthy situation exists in the juridical system in the implementation of our socialist legislation. But we cannot forget that as long as the imperialist-revisionist blackmail and encirclement exists, there is also the danger of degeneration in this direction. For this reason, continuing educational work and preventive actions are necessary for the precise implementation of the laws. There are cases of violations of the laws; sometimes, there are incorrect attitudes in regard to the implementation of legal norms, often resulting from lack of knowledge of the law, but sometimes also resulting from lack of juridical awareness and other things. Violations of the laws are found, in particular, in the area of the protection and handling of socialist property, in labor discipline and in the execution of contracts. These manifestations have been combated and should be combated severely. The organs of the judiciary and of the public prosecutor should react more strongly against any manifestation of illegality, especially by detecting violations and taking measures for their prevention. The organs of state government, appointed and elected persons must carry on a better struggle in this area and, in particular, the internal control organs should do better work. It is important to impress upon every person that no violation should remain undetected, without any stand being taken against it. This is achieved, among other things, by strengthening demands for accountability and increasing the sense of responsibility of each worker and organ.

The most important problem continues to be the knowledge of the laws by all state organs and by the working masses. In Albania, as Comrade Enver teaches us, every person should know the laws; this should be the main principle in the juridical field and the main political and ideological principle.

The government organs and the mass organizations, under the leadership of the party organizations in the districts and at the grassroots, have been more concerned with propagandizing the laws recently. Improvements have been made in the area of the collaboration of organs of the courts and the public prosecutor, and the internal affairs organs with those of the government and the mass organizations. Nevertheless, more must be done in this field. The quality of the work of the organs of justice in the field of propaganda and in the area of prevention, in general, should be improved, while constantly combating manifestations of formalism which are noted from time to time. For example, legal propaganda should be more vital; it should not be carried out through stereotyped lectures, but should take into consideration the concrete conditions and needs of the specific enterprise, agricultural cooperative, institution, sector or brigade where the discussion is being held.

Better work must be done to activate the great armies of assistant judges and people's prosecutors, whose main duty is to propagandize the laws and to be the first barricade against any manifestation of violation of the laws. They are everywhere in the enterprises, institutions, sectors and agricultural cooperatives. Their role in the area of the defense of socialist legality should be further increased. Good work has been done in Sarande and Pogradec districts by the courts in the villages and the city sectors for increasing political and juridical awareness. The district courts and the prosecutors offices should give more attention to the preparation of these organisms so that they will carry out their role as they should.

The government organs, especially the executive committees of the people's councils in the districts and in the grassroots, should do a better job in organizing and coordinating this legal propaganda work. The government organs in Korce, Berat, Fier, Tirana and other districts have given a good example in this area.

We believe that work must be improved in the future by setting up organizational forms which will ensure a continuing propaganda activity, not one which is carried out only when trouble occurs and when there are requests from higher authorities; not only a few cadres or organs in the districts, as happens in many cases, should be concerned with this work. Every organ or mass organization should be engaged in propagandizing the laws according to its area of responsibility. Above all, the section chief, the enterprise director, the chief engineer, the engineer, the brigade leader, the trade union organizations and the other social organizations, wherever they operate, should also be concerned with this work.

The profit is great. If the workers are informed about laws and regulations, if they are held accountable, and if there is continual monitoring of the implementation of the laws, the workers will learn state and proletarian discipline; it will have an influence on their general political, ideological and cultural development and, to a great extent, will make it impossible for elements with evil intentions to damage the interests of the state and of the dictatorship of the proletariat. The struggle against violations of the law, and, in particular, the struggle to prevent these violations, requires organization, coordination and broad cooperation of all state organs and social organizations, under the leadership of the party organs and organizations.

U.S. USE OF COUNTERFEITING AGAINST SOCIALIST COUNTRIES ALLEGED

Rostock OSTSEE-ZEITUNG in German 9 Dec 81 p 4

['Exclusive Report for OSTSEE-ZEITUNG' by Dr Julius Mader: "Counterfeit Money as a Weapon of the USA — Behind the Headlines: Imperial Power Politics in the Gangster Manner -- Unscrupulous Breach of International Law — Insidious Methods of Counterrevolution"]

[Text] Soon to be published by the GDR Cultural League's Berlin District Committee of Numismatics Experts is the "1981 Yearbook of the Panel on Bank Notes and Securities." Included in the handbook is documentation on "Bank Notes as a Paper Weapon in the Counterrevolution." Its author wrote for our newspaper an exclusive prepublication article on this interesting and previously little-explored subject.

Official Government Counterfeiters

Since the end of World War II, the Pentagon and the clandestine U.S. CIA — official Washington institutions, in other words — have carried out counterfeiting operations in at least 10 instances. Just between 1948 and 1973, their operations were conducted in and/or against as many as nine states and their people in Europe, Asia and Latin America. It is significant that among them are six socialist states on three continents.

Moreover, most of these criminal acts — which were aimed at devaluing the legal national currency in circulation, undermining confidence in the validity, the legal validity, of foreign currencies and subverting and destabilizing the economies involved — were summed up and authenticated in detail in the telling documentary entitled "Air-Dropped Propaganda Currency" by R.G. Auckland, British publisher of FALLING LEAF, the journal of the Psywar Society (Psychological War Society, Gesellschaft fuer psychologische Kriegsfuehrung). The article mentions the following organizations as the principal producers and distributors of counterfeit currency: Munich's Radio Free Europe (RFE), the special psychological diversion organ controlled and financed by the CIA; NTS, the Paris-based band of counterrevolutionary Russian emigrants; New York's ominous "Crusade for Freedom"; and Cuban desperadoes in the North American state of Florida. The U.S. Army and Air Force have also unscrupulously breached international law many times with their counterfeiting operations. Gaining notice here were the "Psychological Warfare Section, First Radio Broadcasting and Leaflet Group" of the Eighth U.S. Army (Korean EUSAK Code 8129 — Eighth U.S. Army in Korea), the "Army Psychological Warfare Branch" in Saigon and the Seventh Psywar Unit on Taiwan. Noted generals like D. MacArthur, M. Ridgway, M. Clark and V. Walters have gone down in recent history as organizers of counterfeiting activity.

As early as 1948, U.S. "security advisers" ordered counterfeit 2-peso notes made in the United States to be scattered from aircraft over Philippine territories controlled by the national liberation army (the Hukbalahap); this action was designed to demoralize the patriots. In the course of its military intervention against the Democratic People's Republic of Korea [DPRK], the U.S. Air Force dropped tons of counterfeit 100-won notes over the DPRK in the early 1950's. In the middle of July 1953, the RFE carried out its secret "PROSPERO" operation directed against the CSR: Thousands of gas-filled balloons launched from FRG territory and equipped with automatic jettison devices carried counterfeit 1-koruna bank notes (Kc's) over the territory of the CSR. As psychological "assistance" for the terrorists who had been infiltrated into the GDR, counterfeit GDR 20-mark bank notes of the time and fake 10-ruble and 25-ruble notes were also launched for the CIA from FRG and West Berlin soil when easterly wind conditions were favorable. Each of the balloons carried 300 kg of counterfeit money.

"Paper Weapon" of "Clandestine Army"

Right after the victory of the revolution in Cuba, antisocialist elements in Florida joined with the mafia — as was later discovered and proven by the well-known counterfeiting expert Murray Teigh Bloom, author of "Counterfeiting in America" — and set about producing counterfeit peso notes in grand style under the patronage of the CIA. As early as its military intervention in Cuba's Bay of Pigs, this "clandestine army" of the CIA carried in its initial landing craft hundreds of pounds of its "paper weapon" in watertight rubber sacks. Attempts had been made for years before that to have frogmen carry the counterfeit bills through Cuba's territorial waters into the country and into the hands of their people there.

In 1965 it was Pentagon experts who, along with their puppet-general Nguyen Khanh in Saigon, directed counterfeit 5-dong notes — and even 1000-dong fakes in 1967 — against the National Front for the Liberation (NFL) of South Vietnam with the intention of subverting patriotic organizations. In the middle of August 1966, U.S. Air Force bombers dropped 1.6 million imitation 1-dong notes over the Democratic Republic of Vietnam [DRV]. With the barbaric escalation of its aggression in Indochina, the United States also raised its criminal counterfeiting activities to new dimensions: From August to October 1972, large amounts of fake 1-, 2- and 5-dong pieces of DRV currency were dropped from aircraft over the densely populated provinces of the DRV; in an abuse of Japanese territory, the U.S. Army had set up wholesale production of the money on Taiwan. Masumoto Denme, a Japanese communist and parliamentarian, alerted the Foreign Policy Committee of Tokyo's Lower House to this gangster operation, which also met with international condemnation in October of the same year in Copenhagen on the occasion of the third session of the International Commission for the Investigation of U.S. Crimes in Indochina.

As part of its "CENTAURO" coup d'etat plan in 1973, the CIA made active use of counterfeit escudos against the popular Unidad Popular government of Dr Salvador

Allende in Chile. Shortly after the coup, Hortensia Bussi de Allende, the murdered president's widow who was still privy to official business, made this statement on the affair from exile in Mexico: "For example, counterfeit Chilean bank notes were produced in the United States and put into circulation in Chile. Our country was literally flooded with them. This was supposed to fuel inflation!" After the coup, the United States was quick to remove all traces of evidence of the criminal counterfeiting activity carried out by its intelligence agency: All paper escudos were withdrawn from circulation by dictator Pinochet under the threat of draconian punishment.

Apt Pupils of Nazi Germany

The historical, ideological and organizational roots of U.S. counterfeiting activity are to be found directly in Nazi Germany, since Himmler's "Security Service (SD)" had counterfeited large quantities of pound sterling, dollar, ruble, zloty and Yugoslavian dinar notes during World War II. When Matthew Bunker Ridgway landed in Sicily in the 1940's as commanding general of the U.S. 82nd Airborne Division, his troops were "bombarded" by Hitler's Wehrmacht with fake 1, 2, and 10 dollar bills. Ridgway showed himself to be an obviously apt pupil, for as commander of the U.S. interventionists against the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, he used this perfidious weapon in the early 1950's against the Koreans and the Chinese. As commander of U.S. occupation forces in Austria in 1945, General Mark Clark, LLD, launched a feverish search in the "alpine fortress" for the remnants of the SD's "Bernhard" counterfeiting operation. After May 1952 in Seoul, this same doctor of laws, as commander of U.S. Forces in Korea, ordered up the 6027-9027 series of counterfeit won notes.

The head of the "Bernhard" counterfeiting project had been Walter Schellenberg, SS brigade commander, major-general in the Nazi police force and director of the SD's Foreign Intelligence Service. When he was brought before a U.S. military tribunal in Nuremberg in 1949 to account for his crimes — in the so-called Wilhelmstrasse trial — in typical fashion there was no mention at all of his criminal counterfeiting activities. Nevertheless, in the course of this activity he had helped produce and disseminate fake British currency with a total value of 134.6 million pounds sterling, and he had made preparations for a daily output of 1 million counterfeit dollars. Great Britain was thereupon forced to issue all new bank notes in 1945. During Schellenberg's imprisonment as a war criminal, U.S. and British intelligence experts questioned him for 21 days just on the counterfeiting charges alone. One of his confidants and fellow-counterfeiters, an SS stormtroop commander in the SD, Dr Wilhelm Hoettl, alias Walter Hagen, gave this jubilant account in Bavaria in 1955: "The British had said they regarded 'Operation Bernhard' as a kind of stratagem of war and had consequently decided not to pursue as a crime the traffic in counterfeit pounds produced by 'Operation Bernhard'..." (from "Operation Bernhard," Starnberg).

Meanwhile, proof that NATO, which came into being in 1949, has long since adopted the paper weapon as part of its arsenal is found in the candid and relevant article entitled "A Neglected Weapon of War," written by Canadian Army officer J. Coughlan and published in the 1951 edition of Ottawa's CANADIAN ARMY JOURNAL.

Loopholes Still Open

In the interim, the United States has demonstrated to many a nation that it is not above the idea of using counterfeit money to realize its imperial power politics in the manner of gangsters and Nazis. That may also be the real and inescapable reason why the United States to this day has not effected the legally binding ratification of the Geneva International Agreement on Combatting Counterfeiting, even though it signed the multilateral agreement in 1929.

RIGORS OF PARACHUTE TRAINING DESCRIBED

East Berlin FLIEGER-REVUE in German No 11, Nov 81 pp 496-499

[Article by Hartmut Buch, FLIEGER-REVUE editorial board: "Jumps Between Noon and Midnight -- Reportage from a Jump Site of the National People's Army (NVA) Paratroops"]

> [Text] He had a strange feeling before this jump, but he was not sure if it was fear or not. It probably was fear. The contours of the ground far below were unclear. Now he had to leap from the aircraft. He was caught by the blast but somehow gave a push and turned himself. Up above loomed the bottom of the aircraft. Gennrich followed after him. Why did he jump after him? And now this: The stabilizer on Gennrich's parachute did not deploy. The cover remained closed. Had not he himself hooked up the static line? What would Gennrich do? Would he open the reserve or go into a free fall? Now he heard a startling cry. Or was it a whistle?

Thomas Dibus woke up still hearing the whistle used by the charge-of-quarters. "Wow, that was quite a dream," the 20-year-old thought to himself before he jumped out of bed. The "Willi Saenger" paratroop battalion had left its mark on Corporal Thomas Dibus, occupying the Berliner even in his sleep.

This was not his first time at such a jump training camp, but this year it was a new situation for the mature young man. He had mastered jumping, having already completed 76 jumps with the GST [Society for Sport and Technology] in Berlin. Added to these were the military jumps he had made since first proudly donning the beret. During this year's jump training camp, however, he was responsible not only for himself but also for other comrades. He was in charge of a jump group.

Despite the unaccustomed responsibility which he had to assume, he had looked forward to the jump training camp, as had all the comrades in the battalion. Parachute jumping is their specialty, and they do not just simply carry it out but do it with enthusiasm; otherwise they would be poor paratroopers. When all hands move out to the airfield in the summer and set up the tents, radio stations, field kitchens and all the things that make up an orderly camp, they are caught up in anticipation of the events that will take place during the weeks that follow. The jump training camp is a high point in their rugged army life. Of course, this high point has two sides. On the one hand there was the fun of jumping, while on the other was the hard work and sacrifice because, weather permitting, jumping is carried out here around the clock, and weekends are seldom duty-free. The day Thomas Dibus woke up after his bad dream was supposed to be such a day for him and his group.

Early gymnastics, morning toilet, breakfast and morning formation were behind them as they proceeded to the closed hangars to pick up the parachutes that had been packed the day before. The pack covers are spread out, the parachutes laid out in columns and rows.

The comrades of the Dibus group are first-year personnel for whom jumps without weapons from an AN-2 at 600 meters altitude are planned for today. While the paratroopers busy themselves with their equipment, adjusting the automatic parachute opening mechanisms and carrying out other preparations, their glances travel now and again to the wind sock. The red- and white-striped sleeve stands out almost straight from the pole. The stiff breeze blowing in from the Baltic Sea dampens somewhat the pleasure with which they look forward to the forthcoming jump. The jumpmaster also carefully follows the wind gauge measurements, finally deciding that the third-year personnel will begin with jumps from the Mi-8 and the younger comrades will have to wait. While Thomas Dibus and his group march back to their quarters tent, the experienced comrades put on their parachutes, but that is not all. Protective gear, weapons, the large paratroop bags which they have to attach beneath the main chute, are also put on, hooked up and made fast. Heavily laden, the men move to the Mi-8.

The rotor blades cut the turbulent air, becoming faster and faster; swinging, the helicopter lifts off, noses forward and finally flies climbing away. No more than 3 minutes later, the Mi-8 hovers at the proper altitude over the airfield. The comrades below follow the drop maneuver with attentive gazes; among the observers are the troops of Corporal Dibus, who has advised them to observe this jump in strong wind.

Even sport jumpers with their efficient winged parachutes would certainly think twice about going up and jumping under these conditions. But the paratrooper must hazard the jump even with heavy equipment.

The first jumper has left the helicopter. The others follow at short intervals. A brief fall with the immediately opening small stabilizer chute, and then the green and brown RS-9's pop open in the blue summer sky.

The group has made a good jump; they hang together closely. The jumpers with the cargo bags release their loads, which drop down 10 meters and then hang there swinging on safety lines.

The wind quickly blows the group in the direction of the yellow landing cross. If they were to come down at this speed it would be comparable to a neck-breaking jump from a passenger train, but the first one is already slowing down his speed. The others follow with the same control maneuver. Now they are nearing the ground, and this is what the unitiatated observer can hardly believe: The jellyfish-shaped parachute canopy almost stands still above the ground. The first one lands, quickly jumps to his feet and runs around the inflated canopy. Only in this way will it collapse.

Another one fails to accomplish this maneuver and is dragged over the turf by the parachute, the canopy standing up in the wind like a 60-square-meter sail, until he finally succeeds in releasing one side of the harness. One set of risers falls away and the canopy finally collapses, the wind going out of it like a balloon that has been punctured. The group assembles, then marches to the leader at the landing area who evaluates the jump.

Thomas Dibus and his group also discuss this jump, which for the young comrades was an interesting demonstration of the efficiency of their parachutes. This parachute must of course be mastered, must be controlled with no mistakes. In order to learn how to do this, they prepare thoroughly for each jump task. So Thomas Dibus also uses this time to discuss the upcoming jumps with his comrades, particularly the night jump planned for night. Of course, Thomas Dibus would also like to use this pause forced on them by the wind for a nap because he knows that it is going to be a very long, long day. But one must not give in to such "weaknesses" if one wishes to attain the lofty training goals with the best results. So the corporal goes over the jump tasks once more. He leads the discussion with knowledge and enthusiasm; he listens and proves himself to be a good military leader despite his youthfulness. The Berliner told us this about his route to becoming a paratrooper: "I have always been very active in sports, and therefore -- when I had to begin to think about my military service -- only the paratroops came under consideration. In the Berlin parachute sports section of the GST, where I had such an experienced teacher as Guenter Wolf for my jump instructor, I was able to prepare myself well, in terms of both conditioning and jumping. But to be honest, despite all the preparations the first weeks here in the battalion were hard. You often had to grit your teeth; without meaning to, you began to wonder what was the use of all this struggling, this drudgery...." Like all new comrades, Thomas Dibus thought much during these weeks about our socialist nation, the danger to peace posed by the imperialists and the absolute necessity for major efforts by our soldiers to increase combat readiness.

When the solemn swearing-in of the comrades in his duty year was held, he stood solidly behind the words of the oath of our army personnel. The ceremony and meaning of this hour were increased by the fact that his parents and also his GST jump instructor, Guenter Wolf, attended the oath-taking ceremony.

This high point was quickly followed by the normal routine. The Berliner was one of the best and thus was sent to NCO school, which he likewise completed with good results. In the spring, he acquired the packer qualification for the RS-9 and the reserve gear. This qualification authorized him to instruct other comrades in parachute packing, to inspect parachutes and, finally, to attest to the operational readiness of the parachute -- a very great responsibility, of which he is fully aware, and one which occupies him even in his sleep, as his dream this morning showed.

But Thomas Dibus accepts his new function resolutely and grows more sure of himself with each new day in the jump training camp, especially because he knows comrades in his group are striving to achieve the best training results, just as he is.

There is Michael Gennrich, the 18-year-old from Rathmannsdorf who completed his GST training in Magdeburg and came to the battalion with 22 jumps and good performances in running. He is one of the gung-ho troops, one of the comrades who for example can still finish a "little" 3,000 meter run around the airfield even after a strenuous day of jumping.

Not everyone brings such good qualifications to the orange-red berets. One example is Frank Rumpler from Senftenberg. Although he completed the GST's jump theory course and the ground training, he never received the chance to make a jump. So, like many others, getting acquainted with the sky was a new experience for the skilled machinist. When it comes to a training program that involves as much as paratroop training does, this is of course a disadvantage, but hard work and the help of other comrades keep it from being an insurmountable obstacle.

The 20-year-old had this to say about his first jump a few days ago: "When I put the parachute on for the first time, I was already very excited. Then we had to take them off again; the wind was too strong. Another day of waiting; another day of excitement. Then I finally made it; I was sitting in the AN-2. What feelings those were. But I knew I would jump. Stand up, move in front of the jumpmaster, your foot in the hatch -- jump. The chute opened; I checked out the canopy and looked for the spot. Then my first reaction was a happy one. I'd like to have jumped again right after I landed.

The young man from Senftenberg meanwhile has seven jumps recorded in his jump book; numbers eight and nine are to come today, the latter being his first nighttime jump.

Finally, after lunch, the jumpmaster also clears the first-year comrades to jump. Commands once again reverberate over the staging area. The group leaders check out the parachutes that their soldiers have put on, and then they report to the comrades of the paratroop corps, the specialists, that they are ready to go. Then these specialists make their inspection, which involves giving a grade.

Once again, group after group marches to the small Antonov aircraft, the parachutes open over the airfield and groups of paratroopers guide themselves toward the yellow landing cross.

Corporal Dibus is in high spirits after his group's jump. They received a grade of "1" for their preparations and the jump itself, thus assuring themselves of being among the leaders in the soldiers' competition. Now they have to do just as well with their night jump this evening.

The hours until dusk are spent on an evening run, supper and jump preparations. Once the sun has completely disappeared below the horizon, it is finally time to harness up. Half an hour later they are sitting close together in the AN-2. The tension of their first night jump shows on some of the faces. The group leader says an encouraging word and then peers out into the night while the aircraft gains altitude. The city's harbor installations are clearly visible in the glare of the floodlights. Steaming away from the coast, which looks somewhat lighter, is a small freighter, recognizable by its navigation lights. The paratroopers do not have long to enjoy the lights below or to dwell on their thoughts. As soon as the jumpmaster opens the hatch, the air stream comes whistling into the cabin. The men stand up, move close together and concentrate on the drop, which is to be done as a group this time as well. Now the jumpmaster moves away from the hatch. Thomas Dibus is the heaviest, so he jumps first; the others follow at intervals of seconds. The Berliner feels the jerk of the chute as it opens; shortly thereafter it blots out the starry sky like a dark cloud. The jumper shines his flashlight on the canopy. No damage -- everything's all right. Where are the others? He turns the canopy toward his group and tries to count the number of parachutes floating above him. He is unable to locate them all. The illuminated altimeter indicates a scant 100 meters. Prepare for landing -- the ground is already coming up to meet him. Feet out in front, hit the ground, roll. He hears the other comrades landing beside and behind him.

Now Thomas Dibus flashes his light around -- signals coming out of the darkness for the others, who are supposed to gather around. After about 10 minutes they are all there and without injury. Two of the comrades are already trading impressions of their first night jump. In a friendly way, their corporal admonishes them to put this off until later.

Thomas Dibus is satisfied. They achieved good ratings and have advanced another step further in their training. The tension slowly drains out of him; weariness creeps in. Now -- in an hour at the latest -- they'll be falling into their cots. This time, says Thomas Dibus to himself, his sleep will definitely be dreamless.

SWEDISH PAPER COMPILES LIST OF INTERNED PERSONS

Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 23 Dec 81 p 13

[Article by Peter Johnsson]

[Text] Today DAGENS NYHETER is able to present a list of 260 people in Warsaw who have been arrested since the military council took over power in Poland on 13 December. DAGENS NYHETER is the first of the news media to gain access to the material which was completed on Tuesday.

The list contains the names of intellectuals, known cultural figures and scientists--most associated with Solidarity and prominent people in the struggle for a more open society.

This is the first list that has been made. It is based on information compiled from reports smuggled out of Poland in various ways. This information is now being collated in Switzerland where the Solidarity exile organization has its headquarters.

First List of 260 Intellectuals

It is hard to obtain reliable information as to how many people have been interned in Poland since the military council introduced martial law a week and a half ago. The number varies from the 50,000 of Solidarity to the 5000 of the authorities but other information from diplomatic sources in Warsaw tends to confirm Solidarity's figure rather than that of the authorities.

Naturally it is even harder to obtain the names of people who are interned in camps or jails. The authorities have issued false and misleading information on this point too. For example concerning Miroslaw Chojecki, legendary publisher of underground literature in Poland. According to the official version he is sitting behind bars. But he is the first person I met at the airport in Zurich. And when the coup occurred he was in the United States, he told me.

The names of those arrested get out to the West in different ways. Friends of those in prison give the information to people leaving the country. This information is then passed on to the Solidarity members who are in exile in various places in Europe.

The list published by DAGENS NYHETER was compiled after information from different places in Europe was compared. The information is as reliable as it can be considering the Polish regime's effective cutting off of the country. Thus some mistakes are unavoidable.

This list concerns only the Warsaw area and includes mainly intellectuals.

Of course the list is also incomplete. It is not difficult to name people who are not on the list but are quite certainly interned.

Obtaining the names of imprisoned Solidarity activists from the ranks of the workers is much harder. Only the most well-known names leak out.

Men Interned in Warsaw

Key:

1. Wladyslaw Sila-Nowicki. Legal adviser to Solidarity. Well-known lawyer who on several occasions defended opposition people when they were brought to court. After events in 1976, defender of workers in Radom and Ursus. Under Stalin era imprisoned himself and condemned to death. Sentence changed to life imprisonment and after Stalin's death Sila-Nowicki was set free. Born in 1933.

2. Janusz Onyszkiewicz. Born in 1939. Solidarity's "Machiavelli." Professor of mathematics at Warsaw University. Has been guest professor at among other places the universities at Oxford, London, Leeds, Manchester, Paris. Since this September member of Solidarity's highest leadership. Close cooperator with and adviser to Walesa. Politically involved since student uprising in 1968.

3. Jacek Kuron. One of Poland's most well-known opposition figures. Under 1960's and 1970's arrested several times. One of those behind the founding of KOR--the Committee for Social Self-Defense--in 1976. Since August 1980 adviser to Solidarity presidium. Now arrested along with his wife, Grazyna, and son, Maciej. Kuron was born in 1934.

4. Zbigniew Bujak. A 26-year-old electrotechnical engineer from the big Ursus tractor factory in Warsaw. Bujak is chairman of the Warsaw region Solidarity and a member of Solidarity's highest leadership. Seen by many as Walesa's successor. Bujak is free today, according to some reports, after having fled from a prisoner transport.

COUNCIL OF STATE RESOLUTION ON USHERING IN STATE OF WAR PUBLISHED

Warsaw TRYBUNA LUDU in Polish 14 Dec 81 p 2

["Resolution of the Council of State on the Ushering in of the State of War"; passages enclosed in slantlines printed in boldface]

[Text] /The Council of State of the People's Republic of Poland issued a resolution on 12 December 1981 on the introduction, effective 13 December 1981 of the state of war on the entire territory of the state due to the considerations of state security, proceeding from the need to ensure enhanced safeguarding of the fundamental interests of the People's Republic of Poland and its citizens and also with the aim of creating conditions for the effective safeguarding of state sovereignty and independence as well as quiet, calm and public order, securing the effective functioning of authority, state administration and national economy./

The state of war has been ushered in on the authority of article 33, paragraph 2 of the Constitution of the People's Republic of Poland, which empowers the Council of State to usher in the state of war on a part of or on the entire territory of the People's Republic of Poland, if considerations of defense or state security so require.

For the duration of the state of war, certain civic rights provided by the constitution and specific laws and by international agreements ratified by the People's Republic of Poland are suspended or limited. This concerns, specifically, personal inviolability (article 87, paragraph 1 of the Constitution), inviolability of dwellings and confidentiality of correspondence (article 87, paragraph 2 of the Constitution) as well as the freedom of speech, of the press, of assembly, meetings, marches and demonstrations (article 83, paragraph 1 of the Constitution).

Specific obligations of services to the cause of the country's defense are imposed on the organs of authority and state administration as well as the enterprises of socialized economy. Obligations of serving in the armed forces, in the militarized units and in the units of civil defense are imposed on the citizens.

The principle of subordinating the activity of all organs of state authority and administration, all units of socialized economy and social and professional organizations to the interests of the state and the nation has been adopted.

Special penal, penal-administrative and disciplinary liability of citizens has been introduced, especially with regard to public functionaries, for failure to obey legal order and unconscientious fulfillment of duties to the state.

The above matters are specifically regulated by the provisions of laws, decrees and executive legal acts of the Council of Ministers, Committee for the Defense of the Country (KOK), ministers and heads of central offices, vowodship defense committees, governors and mayors of province-level cities based on these laws and decrees.

The basic legal acts determining the consequences of the introduced state of war are the following decrees, adopted by the Council of State on 12 December 1981: the decree on the state of war and the decree on special proceedings in cases of crimes and violations during the state of war, the decree on the transfer of certain criminal proceedings to jurisdiction of military courts and on the change of structure of military courts and military organizational units of the Procuracy of the People's Republic of Poland for the duration of the state of war, and also relevant regulations of the law of 21 November 1967 on the comprehensive duty of defense of the People's Republic of Poland.

In order to acquaint the citizens with the new legal situation which has been established on the territory of the People's Republic of Poland, further communiques will be forthcoming. On 13 December 1981 on the entire territory of the country proclamations of the chairman of the Council of State were posted in which the rules, bans and limitations and special duties of citizens associated with the introduced state of war were publicly announced.

DRAFT OF INTRAPARTY WORK PROGRAM IN POZNAN VOIVODSHIP PUBLISHED

Poznan GAZETA POZNANSKA in Polish 21 Oct 81 p 3

["Principle Directions of Activity for 1981-1983", submitted by PZPR Voivodship Committee in Poznan]

[Text] On October 8, 1981, we published the draft of the PZPR Socioeconomic Program in the Poznan Voivodship for 1981-1983.

Today we publish the draft of the PZPR Intraparty Work Program in the Poznan Voivodship--the principle directions of activity for 1981-1983.

I. Consolidating the Party and its Leading Role

1. Intraparty life is based on three fundamental Leninist principles:

-- intraparty democracy,
-- democratic centralism,
-- openness of political life.

The full implementation of these principles by the party echelons, the primary party organizations (POP) and the members, will further the attainment of the program goals of the party and ensure permanent party ties with all of society.

2. Solicitude for the party's development must include care to preserve its class character and to closely observe statutory standards.

3. The work of the echelons and the primary party organizations and their executive boards must be based on the principles of collegiality. Before important decisions are made, the opinions of the involved echelons and primary party organizations must be obtained so that the opinions of the broadest ranks of party members may be considered in decisionmaking.

4. Resolutions passed by the party echelons, primary party organizations (POP) and their executive boards must be consistently implemented and the degree of their implementation should be regularly verified by the audit commissions as well as by higher-level echelons. Qualified voivodship committee departments collect the records on the resolutions that have been passed and supervise their implementation.

5. It is the duty of the echelons to inform the POP members about the resolutions that are passed and the reasons therefor, and the degree of their implementation. This practice serves to expand the openness of political life and the credibility of party activities.

6. Changes being made in the work style of the party's statutory apparatus, consisting of a departure from administration in favor of performing a service role to echelons and party members, should be intensified. The specific tasks and place of the permanent party apparatus and its service role to elected organs should be defined, while at the same time organizational efficiency and the precision of operation of all party organizations is preserved.

7. In striving to change the present method of implementing the principle of the party's leading role in our sociopolitical and economic life, it is necessary to:

-- give broad consideration to public opinions and feelings in party activities,

-- base party activities and resolutions on previous consultations with party members and nonparty persons and on the results of studies of social events and public opinion,

-- develop new methods of exerting the influence of party echelons on particular fields of sociopolitical and economic life. They should be based on party inspiration and supervision of the implementation of the party line, and not on the replacement of individual state, social and economic organs in making concrete decisions,

-- vigorously enforce the statutory responsibility of the party members for implementing the party's political-program line at their places of employment, dwelling places, and in the social activity that they demonstrate in other organizations. All of these activities should contribute to consolidating the party's leading role.

8. Consolidation of the party's leading role should take place also through increased activity, conforming to the party's statute and program, of its members who serve on such representative organs as the Sejm and the People's Councils.

II. Party Organs and Echelons

1. The party echelons are charged with:

-- establishing the basic party goals in a given locality or community,

-- directing the settlement of ideological, political and socioeconomic problems,

-- supervising the work of lower-level echelons and the primary party organizations. The echelon has an especially important duty to involve itself in the manner and degree to which primary organizations obtain support for party policies in the communities in which they function.

2. The problem commissions appointed by the committees must become the elements that develop the most important proposals and ideas for the echelons. They must also be the inspiring elements and must pass judgment on the activities of their own and lower-level echelons. The Voivodship Committee departments should also act as the secretarial staff to these commissions.

3. The right to represent the echelons on the outside and to present their positions belongs to the elected members, and with the authorization of the echelon or its organs, to the political workers of a given committee.

4. In order to increase the supervisory role of the general membership of the primary organizations and echelons over their executive organs, the leadership of the particular POP, echelons, and their commissions, submit reports on their activities in the middle of their terms which must be accepted by secret balloting.

5. The audit commissions and the party inspection commissions, in addition to fulfilling their statutory obligations, should halfway and at the end of their terms make an evaluation of the functioning of the echelons and their executive organs. The conclusions emerging from these evaluations should be submitted at the conference sessions, and in special cases, to the higher-level echelons.

6. At the party meetings and meetings of the echelons and other party organs, the participants should speak principally in their own name, and not that of their office. They should share their own thoughts or refer to problems which rankle the social circles in which they function. The party meetings should serve as a forum to exchange thoughts and viewpoints, to honestly analyze the realities and to assess the level of the party's work, to formulate evaluations and conclusions and to develop ideas, and should not be a forum in which to report on plant or community successes. Any censorship, or attemt to censor, any expressions, is forbidden and persons guilty of this will be charged with serious violations of the party's statute.

7. Permanent commissions should be appointed in the echelons, to which proposals, decisions and positions could flow from the party members and POP. This should be material which can be used in developing a work plan for the echelons and their problem commissions and to execute the decisions made by the collegial party organs. It is the task of the executive board of the committee at a given level to deal with the proposals formulated at the meetings of the POP, the committee and the commission, and to demand appropriate reaction to these proposals from those at whom they have been directed.

8. It is the duty of all echelons and POP to be mindful of the high authority of the deputies, councillors and members of various self-governing bodies who are party members. It is through them that the party and its echelons exert an important influence on the activities and decisions of representative bodies and self-governments, and indirectly, on the activities of the state and economic administrations.

9. The Voivodship Committee and echelons at the primary level are obliged to develop a system of party work with party members belonging to union, youth and social organizations. Comrades who are able to be persuasive on primary party goals and who at the same time are able to gain confidence and authority in their community should be utilized in party activities.

III. POP in Party Life

1. The primary party organizations, as the basic element of the party, while maintaining their independence and responsibility, are obliged to observe the general statutory principles of party functioning, the disciplined--in accordance with the principles of democratic centralism--implementation of its program and resolutions.

2. The POP are obliged to implement the crucial issues of party policy and to deal with the problems affecting the community in which they function. Having an important influence on the personnel composition of the party and the quality of its members, the POP are fully responsible for observing the statutory criteria for acceptance into the party and for enforcing the responsibility of the persons doing the recommending. A consistent implementation of this task will cleanse the party ranks of individuals who are irresponsible and prevent the infiltration of non-ideological persons into the party. This will guarantee implementation of the principle of the conformance of words with deeds.

3. The POP, in implementing the principle of openness of political life, are obliged to inform their members about the decisions and resolutions of party authorities at all levels about their work and about the political and socioeconomic situation, thus facilitating a multiplanar analysis of problems, with special consideration to objective, substantive criticism and self-criticism.

4. The POP should undertake activities which will ensure the proper functioning of enterprises and institutes; they should be the stimulators of a movement to raise the political awareness of the working people, the organizers of their participation in the sociopolitical and economic life of the country, the region and their workplace. Party organizations in places of employment, taking into account the multiplicity of information, viewpoints and assessments, should undertake activities to integrate the party community and different communities and generations around the politics of the party and its program. However, in order for this undertaking to be effectively implemented, the higher-level party echelons are obliged to supply the appropriately informative and persuasive propaganda material and the equipment indispensable to distribute and transmit this material.

5. The POP should not directly interfere in the process of managing and directing the enterprises. But as a discerning observer, they should propose optimal changes in those spheres where this may be required, cooperating with the workers self-government, trade-union organizations and youth organizations.

6. In the implementation of the party's program and political line and in order to increase the POP's authority, contacts among organizations operating in various communities should be employed. The development of self-government in the social and economic sphere makes this type of cooperation essential for it can ensure fuller implementation of the idea of the party's leading role.

7. The POP are obliged to evaluate and influence the interpersonal relationships in workplaces and the community and to popularize socialist standards of co-existence.

8. One of the conditions for strengthening the POP's authority in its community is to take a position on vital problems and processes appearing in the community and in the country's sociopolitical life.

9. The POP are obliged to closely cooperate with all social organizations, particularly with socialist youth unions.

10. Primary organizations and party echelons should give a great deal of attention to care of veterans of labor and battles and to utilize their knowledge and experience.

IV. Party Members

1. Joining and belonging to the party is the result of a voluntary and conscious choice of each of its members and assumes the acceptance of a series of obligations, such as absolute observance of the party statute and its ideological principles. In addition to activeness and commitment, every party member should possess the qualities of modesty, honesty, high moral values and civic integrity.

2. Deep patriotism and generosity of work for the good of the country, respect for national values, fulfilment of the ideals and principles of socialism, unswerving loyalty to proletarian internationalism, a struggle with everything that weakens socialist Poland and its alliances with the USSR and other countries in the socialist community and threatens its interests--these are the basic obligations of a party member.

3. In social organization activities each party member should implement the decisions of the party. This is especially important now when the party will fulfill its leading role through the party members in the social organizations, people's councils, trade unions and all types of self-government organs.

4. It is the duty of every party member to increase his familiarity with Marxist-Leninist theory and improve his professional qualifications and general knowledge.

5. Every party member must conduct himself in accordance with the principles proclaimed by the party. He must have the courage to express his convictions and critically oppose those acts that are deemed improper, unworthy or damaging to the party and society. The party requires from its members honest professional work, modesty, sincerity and integrity.

V. The Party's Cadre Policy

1. The influence on appointments to positions in the vast party apparatus and economic units is one of the important attributes of the political party in power. It is based on the selection of a leadership cadre which will create a favorable social climate and the conditions for implementing the party program, and will implement this program.

2. The basic goal of cadre policy is to ensure that appointments to management positions in the state and economic organizations will be made which will guarantee:

-- efficient and effective functioning of appropriate units,

-- conformance of the activities of these units with social needs and anticipations,

-- as concerns positions of particular political importance, conformance of activities of the cadre with the political line of the party.

In addition, the goal of cadre policy is also to create the conditions for proper utilization of the potential for knowledge and skills that is inherent in people and to clear the path for the advancement of all those who possess the indispensable moral and professional qualifications.

3. One of the most important elements of cadre policy is the development of a compact and clear system of cadre selection criteria and its consistent observance.

4. The criteria with which the leadership cadre of different levels and in various units should comply should meet the requirements of the function being performed and the range of responsibility. Irrespective of the requirements, the party, in its cadre policy, will be guided by the following general criteria:

-- high moral, social and ideological qualities, such as, for example, skill in working with and winning over people, decisiveness and communicativeness, conscientiousness and diligence,

-- professional, such as skill in decisionmaking, skill in leading groups of people, and an appropriate level of professional knowledge,

--mental and intellectual predispositions to increase their knowledge,

-- as concerns positions of particular political importance, the proper political qualifications as shown in their political stance, conforming to social expectations.

5. The system of criteria, irrespective of professional requirements and functions, should be developed by the initiative of the POP and party echelons in the shortest possible time, with the participation of representatives of science and experienced practicians.

6. A system of annual evaluations of the results of the work of the leadership cadre should be instituted, taking into account the above-cited criteria. This will assist in formulating the proper cadre conclusions and in improving the functioning of the state administration and the economic units.

7. It is necessary to form a reserve cadre composed of persons with suitable professional and moral and political qualifications, as well as intellectual and mental predispositions, which will ensure that the various functions will be performed. The creation of the reserve cadre will have an effect on the proper implementation of the promotion policy.

8. A critical evaluation should be made of the existing system of training cadre, from the standpoint of its effectiveness, and to make the indispensable revisions. Such an analysis should be made with the participation of the scientific institutes and professional organizations (Chief Technical Organization, Polish Economic Society, SIKP [expansion unknown], etc.).

9. The above-mentioned activities should ensure the proper and undeniable familiarity of the party echelons and organizations with the state of the cadre, which should make it possible for the party to advance people into leadership positions who are well-skilled and ideological, and who have the authority and confidence of the communities in which they function.

10. One form of leadership cadre selection is competition. The party echelons which are really familiar with the cadre can refer the highest qualified cadre to the competition. Party echelons, working with the allied factions and social organizations, can agree with them on candidates for positions, particularly in relation to elected positions in the power structure.

11. An effective and accepted social policy of dismissals from jobs should be developed. It is proper to publicly reveal the motives for the actions of people who were dismissed as a result of negligence, incompetence, or outright criminal activity. Those cadre who were honest and hardworking but could not meet the increased requirements should be dismissed in a manner that does not violate their dignity and they should be given recognition for their past services. Similar procedures should be applied in the case of people who were erroneously promoted, if the worker did everything he could to fulfill his tasks but underestimated his capabilities or the burden of duties undertaken.

12. Cadre policy should be at the center of attention of the party echelons and organizations. Its effectiveness and degree of social acceptance should be constantly examined and actions resulting from the changing situation should be undertaken pragmatically.

VI. Party Apparatus

1. To implement its program and maintain organizational cohesiveness the PZPR must have its own permanent apparatus, maintained from party funds. It is comprised of activists, party secretaries chosen by echelon members and workers appointed by the elective elements.

2. The party apparatus is strictly subordinate to the elective party echelons. In a disciplined and uniform manner it implements the policies and decisions of the collective leadership organs of the party.

3. The permanent party cadre concentrates its activities on preparing proposals for draft resolutions for the needs of the echelons, indicating strategy and policy. It organizes the supervision and execution of echelon decisions and fulfills a teaching function.

4. The apparatus workers should be skilled in analyzing social phenomena, in evaluating their political and class importance, in developing ideas, preparing draft resolutions and activity programs.

5. Party apparatus workers are obliged to unceasingly improve their qualifications through self-education, and also participate in organized forms of training.

6. It is essential that the political workers' affairs, insofar as the law is concerned, are in order. It is also necessary to prepare an intraparty document governing the working situation of those employed in the party apparatus (political worker status).

7. Political workers belong to party organizations in enterprises, state institutions or dwelling places. They have a duty to inform the POP about the work of the echelon in which they are workers, and vice versa.

VII. The Instruction System

The theoretical and ideological armament of the party and its members is an essential condition for maintaining party identity and its internal integrity. A solid knowledge about the goals, characters, forms and traditions of the actions of the communist party prevents confusion in the current ideological-program muddle which is the result of the moral-ideological crisis in the country. To implement this goal, the following component parts of the party education system should be put into effect:

1. Ideological-political preparation of PZPR candidates in a program covering familiarity with the foundations of knowledge on the ideological principles and program assumptions of the PZPR, the party statute and Leninist standards of party life. The forms of this training will differ, with the assumption that the course form will be regarded as basic.

2. A political ideology study department for party members of up to three years' standing. Its goal is to impart knowledge on Marxist philosophy, scientific socialism, political economy and the history of the Polish workers' movement.

3. Universal political instruction, whose goal it should be to interpret the crucial ideological and political problems of contemporary life in the country and to discuss current problems of party policy. The basic form of this instruction should be discussion at training meetings.

4. Training courses will be organized for newly elected secretaries and members of the executive boards of POP, teaching seminars and lecture clubs. The activities of the Marxism-Leninism Evening University will also be directed toward this goal.

5. Special attention should be given to the collection and examination of theory-program materials which are the ideological source of the activities of the opposition forces in relation to the party and socialism. A detailed familiarity with them by the Voivodship Committee lecturers and political workers is an essential condition for maintaining the party's effective ideological offensive.

6. Party echelons are obliged to ensure all possible assistance to the primary organizations in the area of party instruction. This pertains both to assistance in choosing lecturers and in preparing the indispensable materials.

VIII. The Party and Youth

1. The youth movement in the Poznan voivodship will be treated by the party in accordance with the Leninist concept of youth organizations, i.e., organizational self-government and independence of youth unions is recognized.

2. The party sees the youth organizations as a partner in solving sociopolitical and economic problems pertaining to the youth themselves.

3. The party expects that the youth will openly express themselves and voice their opinions and judgments on all problems bothering them.

4. The party's leading role in relation to the youth movement will be implemented through ideological-upbringing and program inspiration in the spirit of democracy based on genuine ideals of socialism, at the same time recognizing the total independence of unions in creating the goal and shaping the forms of ideological-upbringing work.

5. The party will support all initiatives emanating from the youth movement which strive to develop new planes of cooperation with all unions which recognize the principle of a socialist system.

6. The party will endeavor to develop a uniform upbringing system (taking into account the existing polarization of viewpoints) based on socialist values.

7. It is expected that the youth organizations will develop in the young generation some examples of life and thought that are based on the achievements of the past and the current attainments of Polish socialist culture.

8. The party will support and assist the youth in its striving to improve its living standards and material conditions and in its socio-occupational adaptation as quickly as possibly.

9. The party is interested in the development of physical culture among the youth. Physical training in the schools does not meet the developmental needs of the children and youth. Action should be taken to improve the base and cadre working in behalf of physical culture of the children, especially in the rural community.

Resolutions of the Plenum of the PZPR Voivodship Committee in Poznan Dated October 19, 1981:

Regarding the acceptance of organizational assumptions and materials of Section 2 the Program Reports-Elections Voivodship Conference of the PZPR in Poznan.

I. The PZPR Voivodship Committee in Poznan, conforming to the will of the delegates, resolves to convene Section 2 of the PZPR Program Reports-Elections Voivodship Conference. After Section 1 of the Conference, the efforts of the entire voivodship party organization were concentrated on actions aimed at consolidating the party around the implementation of the resolutions of the Ninth Extraordinary PZPR Congress under difficult sociopolitical and economic conditions in the country and in the voivodship. While being aware of the reasons for party mistakes in the past, we must focus the efforts of all party members and the entire party base on the creation of conditions for overcoming the crisis and on the rebirth of political, social and economic life. The program section of our Reports-Elections Voivodship Conference will assist in developing these conditions.

II. The PZPR Voivodship Committee in Poznan, after familiarizing itself with information on the course and tasks of the PZPR Central Committee Fourth Plenum presented by the first secretary of the Voivodship Committee, comrade Edward Skrzypczak, and familiarizing itself with the state of preparations for Section 2 of the PZPR Program Reports-Elections Voivodship Conference in Poznan, by motions presented in the discussions on the materials for the Conference, resolves:

1. Accept the materials from the PZPR Central Committee Fourth Plenum as guidelines for the work of the PZPR Voivodship Reports-Elections Conference in Poznan, Section 2, Program.

2. Fix the time and place of the Conference for Saturday, October 24, 1981, with deliberations to begin at 9 o'clock in the Boguslawski Hall of the Palace of Culture in Poznan, on Armia Czerwona Street.

3. Approve the draft of the Conference agenda, as follows:

-- the report of the Voivodship Committee Executive Board, which, by authority of the PZPR Voivodship Committee Plenum, will be delivered by the first secretary of the Voivodship Committee, comrade Edward Skrzypczak,

-- the report of the Voivodship Party Control Commission, which, by authority of the Commission, will be delivered by the chairman of the Commission, comrade Henryk Stach,

-- discussion,

-- acceptance of decisions and resolutions.

4. Approve the drafts of the Conference materials:

-- the PZPR Socioeconomic Program in the Poznan Voivodship--a plan of action for 1981-1983,

-- the resolution on the 100th anniversary of the workers' resistance movement in Great Poland,

-- the resolution on the construction of a Poznan Army Monument.

5. The PZPR Voivodship Committee Executive Board is obliged to prepare and present to the Conference proposals regarding the following documents:

-- the Conference's ideological declaration,

-- resolutions on actions to grant Poznan the status of a provincial capital and to reactivate the district people's councils and district offices,

-- a resolution on strengthening the workers-peasants alliance.

Regarding the form of ideological discussion in the party:

During a period when social confrontation is intensifying, with concern for party unity the PZPR Voivodship Committee Plenum deems it essential to:

-- concentrate all training-discussion, information-propaganda and agitational efforts and initiatives within the framework of new, democratically formed PZPR echelons,

-- call for all of the heretofore functioning forms of intraparty discussion to join in the activities of the ideological commissions of individual echelons and to create, within their frameworks, a joint platform for political discussion,

-- call upon all activists on the party's ideological front to continue their activity within the framework of the PZPR committees,

-- in undertaking the initiative of the PZPR Voivodship Committee Ideological Commission, support the intention to form a Party University as a plane for integrating the past forms of discussion in the party on the territory of the Poznan Voivodship.

MILITARY AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION, DEVELOPMENT OUTLINED

Warsaw ZOLNIERZ WOLNOSCI in Polish 1 Dec 81 pp 1, 5

[Text] The country's food situation is extremely difficult. The rationing of many food articles, shortages in supplies for the residents of cities and for large urban centers, are already a common phenomenon and are frequently inferment.

The deep crisis which the national economy is experiencing is felt most severely in the area of food and the shorage carries with it many threats. No one will be satisfied living in a country aided from left and right by gifts and donations of food from abroad. Therefore, everything that helps to improve to feed the nation especially now, must be valued and given preference.

It is commonly believed that it is not the job of the military to carry out extensive development in the agriculture, it would be easy though to show precedents set in recent history. That is why certain land, forests pasturages and meadows remain under the control of the military. The cultivable land is of the lowest class, from lV to Vl. The reason the land is of such little agricultural use is due to the lack of land reclamation measures and to degenerating cultivation, because of a need to fulfill the duties of training areas, training grounds and airfields, as well as to the natural erosion of water and weather.

Even though the military has other duties to fulfill, for many years it has successfully conducted its own agriculture--cultivating grain, green fodder, fattening hogs and breeding cattle as well as growing fruit. These are not done in impressive quantities and are still far from exhausing all possibilities.

The intensification of military agriculture took place after 1975, when the national economy began to manifest the first symptoms of strong inefficiences. The perception of and suitable proposals for these symptoms, demonstrates positively who deserves acknowledgement today. Until recently, recognition of military agriculture has been denied, or at least not appreciated, today it is obvious to all and generally recognized.

How can the fact that the military farmers under difficult conditions manage to produce enough pork to satisfy 45 percent of the armed forces needs not be appreciated. A discussion about what sort of relief this creates for the nation under present conditions, would be in order.

What has been accomplished to date

Fattening of hogs and cattle and sheep breeding are important components of military agriculture. But besides cultivating grain, fodder crops and the development of water areas, much has also been done in other areas. Fruit growing is continually increasing. Plastic covered hot houses are generally used for the production of early and other vegetables. Rabbits, ducks and geese are bred. All this is done in several larger agricultural complexes within training areas, and around many barrack areas. They are not large but frequently high yielding farms operated by sections of food units, by schools and educational centers.

After successful years, as was the case with agriculture of the entire nation, the results of military agriculture were significantly decreased in 1980. Unfavorable climatic conditions contributed to [reducing] the level of fodder supply, and therefore the growth rate in the production of animals. Notable were also lower grain, and potatoes harvests.

Much was promised after the present year. In spite of the existing difficulties with harvesting equipment, among others, the planned land acreage was planted. The average grain yield was 22 quintals per hectar. The highest yield--29 quintals per hectare--was achieved by the navy, and the lowest by the Air Force.

The Armed Forces School of Anti-Aircraft Officers should be mentioned, among others, as one that developed agriculture especially well. They produced 37 quintals per hectar. Lt Colonel Zygmunt Burghardt, the organizer and animator of the school's agricultural activities, can consider this as--let us not be afraid of this unpopular word--success. Equally good results were achieved by the farm of Major Antonio Gajecki in conjunction with the Silesian military where more than 38 quintals per hectar were harvested. The builders didn't manage their land badly, where Lt. Colonel Benedykt Jarowski is in charge of this form of production. The artilleryman from the Pomeranian Military district and the Wroclaw Regiment of Territorial Defense did well also.

The prepared, preliminary balance-sheet for this year's military agriculture results indicates increased production of meat and grain. Many units, among others, the artillerymen from the Pomeranian military district, the airmen from the Silesian military district, the liaison from the Warsaw military district, as well as a series of schools, depots and educational centers produced more food than their annual needs of meat and goods. The growing of vegetables under plastic foil was also increased. Plans in this area were surpassed by 3 percent. Favorable results were obtained in the growth of field vegetables and in greenhouses. This is concomitant with an intense preservation of vegetables and fruit. The production of sour cabbage, pickles and mixed vegetables will completely satisfy the need of military mess halls and worker's canteens.

Other than these accomplishments, the ambitious military agricultural military plan for 1981 will not be accomplished in some areas. The production plan of pork will be, for example, 2 to 3 percent short.

As a rule, the obtained production results attest to the progress in the dimension an increased production growth of military agriculture. It should be mentioned however, that the dimensions as well as the production growth of this agriculture do not exhaust all potential capabilities for fattening and breeding animals as well as cultivating grain, fodder crops and vegetables.

Standing in the way of military agricultural development are, among others, shortage of fertilizers, pesticides, fodder concentrates, etc. There are great difficulties with equipment maintainance due to catastrophic shortages of spare parts, tires and storage batteries. As is the case with the entire nation, there are immense problems with attempts to purchase tractors and agricultural equipment. Too many delays accure in the construction of farm buildings and the construction needed for agricultural use.

Such are the realities. The economic crisis and severe food shortages also force the armed forces into undertaking all possible actions and available means to take advantage of all agricultural reserves and to improve the efficiency of this form of management.

The road to increased animal production in the military--according to estimates by specialists from the Rations Service Command--leads through the creation of self-sufficent fodder bases, the guarantee of indespensable reproduction material for fodder and breeding as well as the construction of permanent farm buildings from available materials, within the agricultural system.

In order to obtain fodder, it is imperative to cultivate the two thousand hectars of unutilized croplands and grasslands in the training areas and the perimeters of the airfields. Crop production should completely equal fodder and breeding needs. There should be an intensification in the collection of stale bread and the use of kitchen waste for fodder. Rational nourishment and suitable nutritive fodder are important. Fattening during the closed cycle will be prefered which will facilitate the procurement of breeding stock.

According to preliminary estimates, with the accomplishment of all these propositions, military in 1982 animal production should double by next to this year. In order to accomplish this and to obtain positive results in other sectors of agriculture, tasks related to the development of this production must be precisely analyzed and designed in all districts and branches of the armed forces. In order to realize these tasks, all commanders, soldier's collectives, veterinary services and food co-operatives in units and garrisons should be included. Only through a joint effort will these ambitious plans be assured realization.

Not infrequently, barely 40-50 percent of the agricultural advantages are used.

For the needs of not only agricultural construction, trees from the forests of training areas can be used. Until now, they have been used for this purpose only minimally.

To outfit the military agriculture and forestry for proper implementation ability and with the necessary dynamics for development, the creation of new, higher structures of military, agricultural-forestry management seem appropriate. In the final analysis, this will surely be worth while.

CEAUSESCU HAILED FOR COURAGE, HONESTY OF PLENUM SPEECH

Bucharest FLACARA in Romanian 3 Dec 81 pp 1, 2

[Article by Adrian Paunescu]

[Text] I am sorry that I have to repeat myself, but the use of big words when necessary, and when not necessary, places us in a situation of sometimes being disarmed when faced with the event, weary, lacking the freshness of spirit and words, the only thing which could express the significance of that event. One event is Comrade Nicolae Ceausescu's speech at the 24-25 November 1981 plenum, a speech that I would consider as a great moment of truth. Unfortunately, for a long time, too long, and not only in our times and not only here, some people got accustomed to and tried to get people used to the idea that the ideal is the same thing as the real and from the moment that they wanted to round off a number, it became rounded off in reality. Sometimes the reality became so mystified under certain circumstances that people said: "Great, you guys, but we still cannot eat numbers." But the people saying this themselves were content with the situation of being producers of empty numbers, not covered by reality and truth. There could not be a more vicious circle: as the producers, they gladly accept the advantages of an untrue situation, the advantages of rounding off number the advantages of eluding the truth, while as beneficiaries they are indignant that some people give inexact numbers and the disadvantage of falsifying the truth distresses them.

Some people could say that the lie must be hidden because the enemies of the cause will profit from the unpardoning unmasking of the mechanisms of the lie. Of course, it would seem to be "good" sense to hide the truth in one area or another. But the lesson of a formidible confrontation with the exact light of the truth, which President Nicolae Ceausescu gives, has not merely a political or social or economic significance; in my opinion--and here I think we should dwell--it has a great, very great moral significance.

I think that the moral significance in the end is the most lasting one. One sector and another of the ones criticized by the president will correct their activity. Possibly another sector will continue for a time to lag behind or defects in other sectors will appear.It is human from a purely economic aspect for more mistakes to be made. But the moral significance of this great gesture of courage and resoluteness, of revolutionary lucidity and real love for the party cannot be overlooked. Because, curiously enough, the moral significance, that which the first senses of the human being do not even discern because they cannot be felt, seen or heard but merely understood and mastered at the level of moral awareness, will penetrate as an example in all the acts of the foundation and continuity of our national collectivity.

We shall be all the more required to speak the truth and do our duty, each in our own sector of activity, following this resolute act. The moral significance of President Nicolae Ceausescu's speech of November 1981 is that which moves his words from under the sign of immediate policy to lasting history. This is not the first time he has taken a position, this man of the country, which becomes history, but it becomes history under a title which is dear to all men of conscience: the policy of truth.

Of course, as he said in his speech, the president did not dwell on certain problems but he gave precise diagnoses for other problems, with the treatment which must be applied to be clarified under future circumstances. In particular I am referring to the problems of agriculture, about which we are convinced that they are the subject of Comrade Nicolae Ceausescu's day-to-day thought and action.

However, most of the problems found a principled solution in the November speech, with these problems being, in particular, in the area of the struggle for truth. Once again we learn that the only way for us to exist with everyone in the world and for us to exist with everyone within the country is the truth. And we do not learn this after the lie has made its victims. Rather, we learn it in nearly a prophylactic way.

Even from the advice which the party's secretary general gave to everyone to get to work right away, we see that in the coming period there is a danger resulting from the habit of applauding instead of working.. It would be inadequate and improper for some merely to continually quote the words delivered at this plenum, without applying them to themselves and to the sectors where they do their activity, instead of taking the great example of the relentless struggle for truth by the president as the working weapon and tool in our day-to-day life. This has happened before, for example, at the national conference at the beginning of the 70's, when Comrade Nicolae Ceausescu requested speed and requested original thought while some people, instead of demanding speed in their sectors of activity and instead of encouraging original thought, thought that their duty was merely to applaud with mediocre enthusiasm the ideas then and then to see to their work unhindered, with the warm calm prior to that high moment of truth. What is important is to change a given circumstance, to change a precise historical situation, if it suits us, if it is favorable to us, if we truly love it, into a lasting working tool. Since the active thought of our president is truly exemplary in this speech, then let it become truly exemplary for us, let us understand it as such as to base it on our own struggle for truth in the service of that same cause. When Mihai Viteazul took weapons in hand to fight with his enemies and thus be an example to his soldiers, let us not forget that his soldiers did not just sit down in two lines and clap for Mihai Viteazul, feeling that the struggle for national independence and unity of the Romanian country had to be given only by the prince. No, let us remember, the first reaction of Mihai Viteazul's soldiers was to shout "hurray" and to be excited by the desire to sacrifice themselves for the country and by the desire to prove that they were the army of that brave one, but in the following moments they started the work they had to do and they followed Mihai Viteazul into battle, not quoting his acts of bravery like parrots but accomplishing them themselves, each at the level of his powers, courage and capacity for sacrifice. I think that here lies the crux of everyone's problems of conscience. Putting aside those who feel that Comrade Nicolae Ceausescu spoke great truths but that he said them and so let us all not start telling them now because it is dangerous, leaving aside those who, thus, do not understand that the president is not inventing but he is discovering the truth and that he is the bearer of that truth, from the people to the people and that, thus, he could not help but tell us , leaving aside the occasional opportunists, to be careful of the long-standing opportunists who could understand that a simple reference to this moment arrives at creating a climate of truth of work everywhere in society and of value and good faith. Our duty as communists and patriots is that, by following this brilliant sexample, we should also assume responsibility at every level of existence and tell the truth and fight for the truth. Of course, each person has his own tools. For the peasant, to speak the truth does not mean to give a theoretical explanation of why he was absent from the spring work or the fall jobs. For a worker, to speak the truth does not mean to confess each that "Sir, I could not work because I had something to do." Each one speaks the truth with his work. The peasant's truth is the harvest. The worker's truth is production. The intellectual's truth is the efficiency of his activity. So, let us create a sum of our truths, influenced by this great political truth which President Nicolae Ceausescu told about Romania's domestic and international problems today. The November 1981 RCP Central Committee plenum in many respects had the weight and resonance of a party congress.

A little earlier we noted that a great politican does not invent but rather discovers truths. Let us recall honestly how many times we, as simple citizens, talked among ourselves, sometimes whispering so nobody else would hear us and tell on us, that on my word of honor things are not good, everyone was saying that, look, some people are disinforming the comrade. Why are they reporting what is not true, why are they saying that the harvesting is completed when it is not, why are they putting products on the market, especially when the comrade visits? President Nicolae Ceausescu told about many of these problems from the tribune of the November plenum with an extraordinary firmness and a skill of finding out the truth which simply fascinates you. Were these not exactly the problems we were thinking about ourselves? Did we not say,oh, how good if the comrade found out that some people are giving false reports and that some are gilding the outside while there is disorder on the inside, oh, if he could see how we suffer sometimes and if he could know. And, look, he did found out and did not keep it to himself, but he let the entire party and all the people know. And he actively admitted them, also initiating measures which resulted from a profound investigation of those lies. Of course, there also is another way to resolve these lies, a secret way, with small punishments in the office and measures taken behind closed doors. It is impressive that, despite the rumors which it will arouse among the enemies to our cause, this policy of the truth has been carried out and is being carried out without risk to the use of the nation and the high moral significance. Because, I repeat, we will have to understand from this truth being told that we ourselves are obligated not only to speak the truth but also to implement it, not only to quote it, but to make the truth incarnate. We must understand that we ourselves are obligated to the truth. Bread is a truth and we must produce it. Industrial product is a truth and it must be of a brilliant competitiveness. Intellectual product is a truth and it is not the case for us to hide behind our hands and not recognize that too many times we abandon ideas because "they are not possible" and we stop the fight.

Again we feel that the dictionary is somewhat tired of so many big words like the ones delivered or written on various occasions and again we must admit that we need a fresh soul because we are living through moments sometimes which, through the load they really bear, become history. I would consider this moment of truth of November 1981 as among the great battles of the Romanian nation. It even is a battle with us ourselves. The circumstance whereby, we have those forces for a new freshness within this party, proceeding from the awareness of the person elected to head it, forces capable of setting a straight path for our ship in the storms of the age and against weakness and lies of some of the boatmen, is proof of the tireless force and fitality.

Comrade Nicolae Ceausescu, our appluase will be, must be, our acts. Each day we shall quote the wise and courageous words, at the level of our work and possibilities, that which you have founded for an entire party and for all the people: the struggle for truth. And even if it is sometimes inconvenient--and we know that it will be inconvenient many times--and even if it is tiring, even if it will seem that we are the direct descendants of Sisyphus on occasions, we shall conduct this struggle with all the powers and that dose of romanticism which has not disappeared and which should not be ashamed before the low kind of pragmatism of some who feel that man is a registration number. And we shall continue to think of everything, the new economic-financial mechanism, the need for clearing up the peasant's status, the need for a deeper use of the most important raw material in the world, the gray matter, the need for competition of values and correct incentives and our place in the world and our true friends and we shall recognize honestly that our entire life, if it is a struggle for truth, in itself quotes this stormy plea for the truth which you have made and that only at the moment when we no longer exist will we be able to say that we have closed the quotation.

NATIONAL UNITY SAID TO TRANSCEND 'STATE PLURALISM'

Bucharest ERA SOCIALISTA in Romanian No 19, 5 Oct 81 pp 11-14

/Article by Dr Florin Constantinu, N. Iorga Institute of History: "State Pluralism and National Unity"/

/Text/ Did the existence of several Romanian states (countries) (state pluralism) in the Middle Ages and well into the modern period affect the Romanians' national unity? Did state pluralism correspond to an ethnic pluralism, or in other words did the existence of several political units in the Carpatho-Danubian area reflect the existence of several peoples in that area, which is identical with the ancient Dacian homeland? These are questions to which Romanian historiography has given scientifically substantiated negative answers, but they come up again whenever the ethnic unity of the Romanians in Wallachia, Moldavia, Transylvania and Dobrogea is questioned or actually contested by prejudiced interpretations of the Romanians' past. The older and more recent studies of the Romanian historians have proved that state pluralism could not impair, to say nothing of destroying, the Romanians' national unity as a historical fact or its spiritual expression, the consciousness of national unity that became the national consciousness after the Romanian nation was formed. Knowledge of the conclusions of Romanian historiography about the problems of the Romanians' ethnic and liguistic unity and the forms of their unity before the national state was established cannot be confined to the circle of professional historians. Those conclusions concern every citizen of the nation, who should know his own people's past so that he can properly answer any distortions of that past. The memorable appeal in Miron Costin's work "On the Moldavian People" is still valid today: "Now look at yourself, dear reader, as in a mirror and consider whence you came, forgetting all other tales that some have told about you out of ignorance, others out of envy, which has never been lacking in the world among peoples, and others from confused and unfounded writings."

State Pluralism in Other Peoples' History

State pluralism is not peculiar to the Romanian people's history. The existence, especially in the medieval period, of several states inhabited by fractions of one and the same people is to be found in the past of several peoples on the European continent and, for that matter, outside it too.

After the territorial fragmentation of Kievan Russia and the separation, in the group of eastern Slavs, of the Russians from the Ukrainians and Belorussians, the Russian people lived within several principalities like Rostov, Iaroslav, Tver, Moscow et al. of which Moscow became the unifying center around which the centralized Russian state was formed in the second half of the 15th century. There were several medieval kingdoms on the territory of present-day Spain, namely Aragon, Castille, Leon and Navarre, which were unified by 1512. Germany and Italy were not unified until the second half of the 19th century. For centuries Italy was a geographical reality identified with the Italian peninsula but not a political one, since there were several states within the peninsula (the Papal States, the Venetian Republic, the republics of Genoa, Siena and Florence, which became a principality, the Duchy of Milan, the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, et al.). Italy was unified in four stages (1859, 1860-1861, 1866, and 1870) around the Kingdom of Piedmont. The unification of Germany, on the territory of which there were over 300 states upon the conclusion of the Peace of Westphalia in 1648, was accomplished by the Kingdom of Prussia and was not completed until 1871 (The empire proclaimed then maintained a federal structure).

The examples can be multiplied, but the foregoing are conclusive. Just as no one can contest the existence of the Italian people because there was a Venetian state, a Genoese state, etc. within whose borders Italians lived, the existence of a Wallachian state and another Moldavian or Transylvanian one cannot invalidate the existence of the Romanian people. Parts of one and the same people, the Romanians, lived within those states.

State pluralism is characteristic of feudal society. The predominantly natural economy (closed) characteristic of the medieval world favored areas inhabited by the same people and regional peculiarities expressed politically by the formation of states that were sometimes quite limited in size (microstates). As the productive forces and economic exchanges developed many ties were formed among these political units that were enhanced in some cases by extraeconomic factors (external threats for example) that hastened their territorial and institutional unification. In other cases a series of historical factors delayed the maturity of the historical conditions for national unity or acted against that unity. In the case of the Romanian countries the conquest of Transylvania by the Hungarian kingdom, the establishment of Ottoman rule over the Romanian countries, the Habsburg rule over Transylvania and later over Bucovina too, and the impact of the simultaneous expansions of the great empires in that part of Europe restricted the natural development of Romanian society and created conditions unfavorable to the unification of Romanian territory.

Factors for the Romanian People's Unity

The existence of several Romanian states (countries) meant a division solely on the level of political-administrative organization, which could not affect the much more profound reality of the Romanian people's unity, generated by a series of such factors as territory, language, economic activity, social-political structure, culture etc., which facilitated relations among the Romanian countries and accordingly favored the Romanian people's unity.

a. Territorial Unity

A rapid glance at the physical map of Romania immediately reveals the symmetrical nature of the Romanian territory, centering on the Transylvanian plateau, bordered by the chain or rim of the Carpathians, and then descending into an amphitheater through the zones of the Subcarpathians, hills and plains. The Carpathians were never a barrier, since the mountain roads over the peaks and the passes permitted easy communication between the populations on both sides of the mountain range. In its turn the Danube, although marginal for a large part of its course along Romanian territory, was the end point of two great trade routes through Romanian territory in the Middle Ages and in that period it performed an important strategic function in the struggle to defend independence. It may be said that the Carpathians and the Danube were the definitive unifying factors of the Romanian area.

b. Linguistic Unity

The Romanian language is characterized by its uniformity and the ease with which it is spoken and understood by all Romanians. Aside from their Balkan branch (Aromanians, Meglenoromanians, and Istroromanians, vestiges of the great eastern Romanian bloc dislocated by the Slavic invasion in the sixth and seventh centuries), the Romanians north of the Danube (Daco-Romanians) speak a language without dialects that considerably facilitates communication.

Another equally characteristic and noteworthy trait of the Romanian language was its resistance to the successive waves of migratory populations, who could not essentially change its main vocabulary, to say nothing of its grammatical structure, even when they ruled over the Romanian territory and finally settled among the indigenous Romanians. The Italian humanist Antonio Bonfini (1434-1503), who lived at King Matia Corvin's court for a long time, noted the Romanians' efforts to preserve their language. "(They) resist so stubbornly that you see it as a struggle not so much to keep their lives intact as their language. For who would not marvel, if he stopped to consider the frequent waves of Sarmatians and Goths as well as Huns, Vandals and Gepidae and the inroads of Germans and Langobards, that the remnants of the Roman language have still been preserved among Dacians and Getae?"

The use of the Slavonic language, according to the medieval tradition, in the princely chancellery and in the religious service did not alienate Romanians from their mother tongue. About the year 1475 Nicolaus Machinensis, bishop of Modrussa, who knew Vlad Tepes, noted the difference between the Slavonic religious language (In the Middle Ages there was the theory of the so-called sacred languages in which religious services could be held) and the Romanian mother tongue (vernaculus sermo) that the Romanians spoke "from their origins" (ab incunabilis).

This ancestral language united the Romanians throughout the Carpatho-Danubian area across the frontiers of state pluralism. The Moldavian, the Wallachian and the Transylvanian knew that their dialects, which naturally showed certain distinctive features, were nothing but one and the same Romanian language. Miron Costin says it plainly: "As we see that although we are now called Moldavians we do not ask, 'Do you know Moldavian?' but 'Do you know Romanian?'" That is clear proof that their language was one of the most powerful factors for the Romanians' national unity.

c. Economic Unity

As we know feudal society was characterized by its natural economy (closed), which does not mean that trade did not exist. Even if there were only the natural conditions (some bread grains, vines etc. could be grown only under certain soil and climatic conditions), economic exchanges would still have been a necessity. Actually there was a commodity production in feudal society, the extent and economic importance of which increased with the advance toward capitalism and the formation of the regional markets anticipating their unification in a single national market corresponding to the national state.

Wallachia, Moldavia and Transylvania, separated by political borders, were united by a dense network of economic relations. In the 15th-16th centuries Brasov, Sibiu and Bistrita were economic centers of the whole Romanian area, and Brasov was a kind of economic capital of medieval Romanian society.

This situation was clearly determined by relations with the Romanian territories south and east of the Carpathians, a fact correctly perceived by the great minister in Wallachia Vintila, who wrote to the Brasovans in 1558, "You well know that without us you cannot be your country, Tara Birsei, and without our country you cannot exist."

When later on the court in Vienna tried to break Transylvania's economic unity with Moldavia and Wallachia in the second half of the 18th century, the Transylvanian Aulic Chamber in Vienna pointed out, in 1779, "the tie between the great Principality of Transylvania and the neighboring countries, Moldavia and Wallachia, and the urgent need of importing large quantities of the raw materials the Principality of Transylvania needs." Transylvania's economic orientation toward the Romanian Principalities is illustrated among other things by the figures on its trade in 1838. Exports to the Romanian Principalities and the Turkish provinces amounted to 2,995,091 florins compared to 89,144 florins in exports to Hungary and the Austrian provinces, and the imports from the Romanian Principalities and Turkish provinces amounted to 4,157,055 florins compared with 172,408 florins in imports from Hungary and the Austrian provinces.

The great Romanian historian Nicolae Iorga pointed out this economic unity of the Romanian area in the period of state pluralism in terms of notable authenticity and clarity. Stating that Moldavia and Wallachia "formed a single country economically," he went on to say, "The first unification of the Romanians existed when that idea had not occurred to the scholars, in the perfect unity of their economic life based upon the perfect unity of their life in general, and Transylvania also entered into that life through Romanian intercirculation: a single body and a single veined system, I should say, through which the same living blood flowed."

d. Unity of Social-Political Structure

Romanian medieval society was formed uniformly throughout the Romanian territory, so that state nuclei (principalities and voievodates) appeared in the 9th-10th centuries throughout the Carpatho-Danubian area which evolved toward formation of a single feudal state. The conquest of Transylvania by the Hungarian kingdom (begun in the 10th century and not finished until the beginning of the 13th century because of the resistance encountered) interrupted this process by removing the geographic "heart" of the Romanian area that is Transylvania.

But it is indicative of the Romanian character, from the demographic and institutional standpoint of Transylvania, that the conquerors themselves, when they had to give a political-administrative organization to the recently subjugated territory, were forced to resort to the typically Romanian institution of the voievodate(As the great Romanian Slavic scholar I. Bogdan said, beneath the Slavic cover of the word there is a characteristically Romanian content that distinguishes the Romanian voievodate from the institutions of the same name in Slavic: in Romania the voievod is the supreme leader while among Slavs he performs a subordinate role). The two free Romanian countries south and east of the Carpathians, Wallachia and Moldavia, were also voievodates.

The typical feudal social structure (with two basic classes, the great landlords and the peasants) in the whole Romanian area, which developed free of foreign interference, consisted of boyars and peasants, free or dependent, organized in territorial communities with similar structures throughout the area inhabited by Romanians. In Transylvania the Hungarian conquest brought a class of Hungarian nobles just as in Dobrogea the Turkish conquest introduced the system of land organization typical of Ottoman society. But it is significant that in Tara Fagarasului, long under the Wallachian princes' authority and escaping the central Hungarian authorities' strict control because of its location, the division into boyars and serfs persisted long after Transylvania passed under the Hungarian crown.

The same way of life in the Romanian areas caused the Transylvanian peasants, who were subject to a regime of manorial obligations much more oppressive than the one across the Carpathians, to seek refuge in Moldavia and Wallachia. They came to theirs to stay among theirs in such numbers that the inhabitants of the two Romanian countries east and south of the Carpathians could exclaim in the 18th century, "All Transylvania has come to our country."

Romanian Countries' Political and Military Collaboration

Faced with the same dangers (especially the Ottoman expansion directly threatening their existence as states), the Romanian countries developed a close collaboration on the political and military levels to unite and thus strengthen their forces before the common enemy. In the same struggle in defense of their own state structures and for their independence, the three Romanian countries' cooperation often took the form of true confederations, as for example in the time of Iancu de Hunedoara, who organized and led an anti-Ottoman front of Transylvania, Wallachia and Moldavia. The close and staunch tie at the time among the Romanian countries was expressed by Bogdan II, voievod of Moldavia, who wrote Iancu de Hunedoara on 11 February 1450, "The land of my reign and the land of your reign shall be one."

The rule of some domains in Transylvania (such as Ciceul and Cetatea de Balta, Bistrita, Rodna and Ungurasul) by some Moldavian princes, the aid given by the princes of Moldavia and Wallachia to the Orthodox Romanians in Transylvania and their churches, and especially the three Romanian countries' collaboration before the Ottoman peril lent relations among Moldavia, Wallachia and Transylvania a stability and depth which were among the prerequisites of their later unity.

The effort toward political unification of the three Romanian countries, also manifested by Sigismund Bathory or Gabriel Bethlen, could have no chance of success unless its promoter was a Romanian, since the Romanians formed the indigenous population and the overwhelming majority of those countries. No foreigner, but a man of the land could hold the scepter of authority over the entire Romanian people. This was Mihai Viteazul, prince of Wallachia (1593-1601).

The first unification of the Romanian countries, achieved by him in 1600, was of short duration because the international situation (the hostility of the Ottoman and Habsburg empires especially) was against it. Mihai Viteazul's deed remained as a political legacy that the following generations exploited under more favorable conditions. Mihai Viteazul was no conqueror of foreign countries but the unifier of the Romanian soil and the Romanians, who knew and said plainly in those years "that we are all of one law and one language," as the Wallachian boyars put it in a letter to the Moldavian ones of 5 September 1599, an especially significant testimony because it came from a group hostile to the great prince.

Consciousness of National Unity

On this objective basis of ethnic, linguistic, economic, social-political and cultural unity the Romanians formed and developed their consciousness of national unity as the collective spiritual reflection of the historical fact of the existence of the Romanian people as a single people forced to live in several political entities but perceiving their unity.. There are so many expressions of this consciousness that it is difficult to choose among them. But let us mention a few. In a message to the Venetian senate in 1478 Stefan the Great, voievod of Moldavia, referred to the neighboring state of Wallachia as "the other Wallachia," that is another Romanian country. It was accordingly clear to the great prince that his country and the neighboring one were in fact political units of one and the same people, the Romanians, regardless of the two countries' official names.

The idea of all Romanians' ethnic unity was clearly and concisely expressed by the first of the series of great Romanian chroniclers, Grigore Ureche: "The Romanians, inhabiting the Hungarian Land, Transylvania and Maramures, are of the same place as the Moldavians and they all came from Rome." Their unity is much more fully and soundly treated by the Moldavian chronicler Miron Costin, who devoted a special work, "On the Moldavian People," to these problems. Besides the wealth of information, the political purpose of the chronicler's scientific inquiry should be pointed out: The Romanian should know his true origin, hold his head up, and do away with prejudiced explanations.

The Wallachian chronicler Constantin Cantacuzino had the same ideas and the same political purpose: "... We, the Romanians, are true Romans and noble Romans in faith and in manhood... But the Romanians understand not only those here (in Wallachia -- our note) but also those in Transylvania, who are also natives, and the Moldavians, and all those who are elsewhere and speak that language... We also consider them Romanians because they have all come from the same source and [cura]."

The culmination of all these efforts to prove the Romanian quality and unity of the Romanians is the scholarly prince Dimitrie Cantemir's learned work, "Chronicle of the Antiquity of the Roman-Moldavian-Vlachs," which combines in the title of the first part the ideas of continuity and unity and the true legacy of political ideology: "Chronicle of the Whole Romanian Land (Later Divided into Moldavia, Wallachia and Transylvania) from Its Colonization by Trajan, the Emperor of Rome... And for the Romanians Who Then Settled There and Have Been Constantly Living There Until Now."

Consciousness of this unity of the Romanians is apparent in nearly all the important works of medieval Romanian culture. The metropolitan Varlaam significantly entitled his "Collected Sermons" the "Romanian Book of Instruction" (1643) and it actually enjoyed a wide circulation in all three Romanian countries. The code of laws published in Iasi by Vasile Lupu in 1646 was also entitled "Romanian Book of Instruction." On the title page of Serban Cantacuzino's "Bible" (1688) it says that it "was dedicated to the Romanian people." In 1821 Tudor Vladimirescu asked for relations to be established "with the Moldavians, because we are of one people and one law.... being of one mind and one voice with Moldavia we should be able to enjoy the benefits of these principalities equally by helping each other. On the field of Blaj in 1848 the Romanian peasants cried, "We wish to be united with the Nation," because for them and for the Transylvanian Romanian masses "the nation" meant the whole Romanian national community across any frontiers.

Once the Romanian nation was formed, consciousness of national unity became the national consciousness. Romanian society's progress in transition from feudalism to capitalism objectively required formation of the national state by liquidating state pluralism. The latter had become anachronistic and had to be eliminated.

The unification of Moldavia with Wallachia in 1859, followed by completion of national unity in 1918, was to meet this objective necessity by making the Romanians' unification in a single state irreversible and as lasting as granite. Conceived on the land that became their country, the Romanian people faced the vicissitudes of the centuries together. As Nicolae Ceausescu said in his speech on the 60th anniversary of the founding of the RCP, "The descendants of the Dacians and Romans, the new people who asserted their own existence, have developed constantly and remain the true and sole masters of ancient Dacia."

RFE INTERVIEW WITH VIRGIL TANASE DISCUSSED

Bucharest ROMANIA LITERARA in Romanian 24 Dec 81 p 3

[Article by Vasile Baran]

[Txxt] Some eight years ago, it was warm (I know because I was thinking of taking a little sunbath along a stream passing through Cumpatul Sinaia), I met Virgil Tanase, a young man. At that time I was writing a scientific-fantasy novel, but I still did not know very well how it would be, and he lent me a book which, as he said, would help me "theoretically." That is even what the first chapter was called: "The Fantasy Between Theory and Expression," in which Roger Caillois unraveled the symbol of the "Octopus of Japan." The volume I borrowed actually was "20th Century." I read it all at one sitting and, at the same time, with pencil in hand, because it was very valuable to me in working out the novel which appeared the next summer, entitled " Island of the Mannequins" with the subtitle of "A Fantasy Novel" (I had not dared to also call it "scientific," since I had feared mathematics since I was a child). What is certain is that the fantasty only now was being produced. I had written on the borrowed book: Virgil Tanase, Villa 1, Palace pavilion, third floor, Room 328, thinking to take it to him. But he had left. Nobody could tell me where. And I was left with that "Century" with a cover represetning a Japanese statue. Being from Gorj, son of a peasant (here if you cannot give back something you borrowed, you keep it as something not to be touched until you find the owner!), I put it in the bookcase, in the most protected corner and went about my work, of course, with the thought that he would appear sometime. Despite this, from time to time, needing Caillois' study (this time for writing a new fantasy novel entitled "The Flat Earth," which appeared lsst year), I caught sight of that notation: Virgil Tanase, Villa 1, Palace pavilion, third floor, Room 328, and I was thinking: where could he be?Someone had told me that he had seen his name in the want ads of a Paris weekly in a column in which he was looking for "any" job. I asked myself, does he exist or not?

Until, at the end of 1981, I found news that he does exist. Virgil Tanase was invited by "Free Europe" radio to a discussion on the subject: "What chances does a Romanian writer have of being published in the west?" "What chances," he was asked, and he answered, "I am tempted to answer you with a paradox: at the same time, it is much easier than in Romania and much more difficult." His answer aroused interest.

I said to myself, let's see what is easy and what is hard.

And Virgil Tanase began explaining clearly, without any paradoxes:

"The young Romanian beginning writer must take into account that the French literary market is completely different from the Romanian one and, primarily, this method of trial, which is the literary review, does not exist. In Romania, a poem, a group of poems, skits, a portion of a novel may appear in literary reviews. In France--because I can only speak of the situation in France, which I know best--there are very few literary reviews which publish literature."

This would be the hard part. And what is the easy part?

Books, I tell myself. Then it is alright! Virgil Tanase, however, does not allow me to slide so fast toward the fantasy. Right away he adds: "Now we should know that the space can be rather long between the point at which a writer tries out his hand and the point at which he arrives at jumping over the lath, especially when it is in Paris, but, at the same time, if you have certainty and faith in your talent--very important--you can develop in awaiting this point."

Simple, but at the same time complicated. First of all it is a matter of talent. That is, a matter of something very important, as he himself emphasizes rightfully. Because outside of talent there would be nothing left to discuss. You can place the young aspiring writer even in a greenhouse with sun and fruit in the trees in full winter and bring him guitars, but if he hasn't got it, he hasn't got it! Then the space between the points, the point at which you start and the point at which you must jump over the lath. Because, look, it can happen, as a clown once said, for the horse to jump over you and not you over the horse. But even more serious is the length of this space which can be endless, as does happen. Anyhow, until now we have not heard of a Romanian writer who has left the country during our years to another part of the world and has become famous.

You give a book, it does not appear, but it is not a catastrophe. You give another one, the publishers translate it with their money, throw it out, "but even this is not a catastrophe." Then when does the catastrophe occur? Virgil Tanase answers: "Here I think it is a difficult problem because a poorly translated book is devaluated more than a manuscript."

But if "finally it appears?" That's good, I tell myself, the mouth of the catastrophe can close, but, look V. T. is asked a direct question: "What chances do I have to be a young writer in Paris?" and he, Virgil Tanase, answers, "I know from my own experience" and he explains:

"In France at least you cannot live from your writing except from a certain share of the sales and up. There are very few French writers who actually live from their writing and they all have side professions, either in education, in journalism or they work for a publisher; very little can be earned from one book: it is a percentage of the sales. For my last book, around 5 francs got back to me , the author, per copy."

He was asked: "How much do five francs represent of the price?" and he answers: "Just one-tenth. So I would have to sell 50,000 copies so be able to live at least one-two years from this book."

And he goes on:

"When a book in Paris is sold in several thousand copies, this is a great success. Here the possibilities do not exist to live from your writing."

Virgil Tanase's answer to the last question, "what advice would you give a young person who wants to come to Paris to try out his chance as a writer?" completely bursts the cloud of fantasy, and, like a cliff appearing before a ship, raises the reality:

"No matter what our talent would be, outside of just some cases of very great chances, there is a point between writing and the point of affirmation. All this time must be ensured, you have to have something to live from, you have to have peace to be able to write another book and I think we cannot have any illusions, even in the happy case where the book is published." "You have to have something to live from," V. T. says, and his confession seems to me to be one of the most natural: you have to have something to live from, no matter where you are and no matter what you are doing, in whatever profession you are working, you must be covered! However, what bothered me the most in this last answer was the unexpectedly serious finding: "You have to have peace to be able to write another book."

Because the peace which the person who abandons his country desires in no way is the same as the peace of the man who comes to his own home each night. No matter how many friends he makes there, he still is a foreigner. I was told about an important director, very respected in the countries where he was making movies as an artist of his country. But from the moment at which he asked for political asylum, everybody looked on him as a nobody. He no longer represented his nation, there no longer was a pride in his country. This occurrence was told to me by another director, who had admired him a lot, but now not even he respects him as before. It is not a good idea to stay too long in a place which is not your own, even as a guest.

"We cannot have any illusions," V. T. said in his answer, not "even in the happy case where the book is published." And he is absolutely right: A book is a life which cannot be described by fleeing from your own country.

So "Free Europe" radio, so concerned with the fate of writers from Romania, be they young or old, that it breaks your heart, gives us the real picture of what what the mirage of affirmation in the west means "right from the sinner's mouth." So even when the "literary" mentors of "Free Europe"--Monica Lovinescu and Virgil Ierunca--propose to scrape together their own "work," they cannot exceed the limits of some awkward collections of words, words, words.

Words which, no matter how much poison they throw out on the airwaves, are in flagrant contradiction even with the assertions of the hotbed which seeks only to denigrate the real conditions of the discovery, promotion and affirmation of talents in Romania.

The example which this very hotbed has given through V.T.'s confessions has been more than eloquent.

WRITER UPSET BY CRITICISM OF ANONYMOUS CALLER

Cluj-Napoca TRIBUNA in Romanian 10 Dec 81 p 5

[Article by Ion Aurel Stoica]

[Text] Recently, I got a telephone call from someone who presented himself as a constant reader of TRIBUNA and he asked if I knew the expression "noblesse oblige." I answered that not only did I know it, I believed sincerely that nobility does have oglibations.

Further, he asked my profession and I answered that I was a mechanical engineer and some information about myself.

Continuing, without respecting the elementary rule of a telephone conversation of giving your name, he said he felt that as far as I was concerned I had rejected nobility as long as I was writing about philosophical, ethical, economic and physical problems, about people and personalities who had entered into the history of science, about the industrial revolutions, problems of biology, computers and, more recently, literary problems and others.

Because he did not wish to hear my point of view, I feel obligated to write something in my defense.

First, I state that I detest intellectual prostitution, people who read little, write and talk a lot, those who communicate words and not ideas, who waltz through the libraries and read only on the bus, who through a lack of culture do not belong to any system of thought, who have obtained their informative perfumes from discussions over a cup of coffee or a glass of Bacchus' liquor and only the words which could pierce the cigarette smoke got through to them; people who think they are cultured because they read police novels and do not fall asleep watching the scientific television series or the television encyclopedia programs, which I also enjoy and feel honor for the national television station; to them, I say that not everything that glistens is gold, that sand and bronze have wide usage in man's demiurgic process of changing his nature for his own good, but I do not replace gold as a symbol of value and, metaphorically speaking, did not inspire authors who theorized that ashen gold is the supreme individual and collective wealth of peoples and of humanity.

Second, I do not think that those who assert, spitting out the words, that meditation and particularly global meditation is a profession which you gain by a diploma or may be a means of existence are correct; I am convinced and I have innumerable examples of people who through their very deep knowledge of their specialty, through their vast general culture, cultivating their passion and vocation for generalizations, came in the front door, coming from exact sciences to the citadel of global meditation, general and universal about life and knowledge; to deny someone the right to do philosophical meditation just because he did not graduate from the faculty of philsophy I think is at the least immorality and evilness, if not even ethnical trogloditism and it is identifcal with considering all graduates of this faculty as philosophers; prior judgments do not refer to me, I am trying to reflect modestly, because I like to feel that I am living, I do not claim to communicate invented valuable ideas, but I like so much what Spinoza wrote in his famous book, "Ethics": "free man thinks the least on death ; his wisdom is to meditate not about death, but about life." And I venture to add that optimism and pleasure with life are given by understanding the fact that nature probably can only create life through death, that this life in which the sum of born life is greater than the sum of death is that which ensures the continuity of the living and intelligence on this planet called earth; by this, I did not want to say that of all the animals man is the only one who is aware of the fact that individual life is finite in time that is, if he knows that life ends with death, then he should believe that death is the purpose of life. I am convinced that detachment from these dreadful tragedies, as well as the refusul of dissipation because life is short, can only be given to you by knowledge and meditation according to the natural qualities with which you were born and the information you have obtained with a lot of sweat and convulsion in the synapsis.But it is worth it.

Third, I confess that I have great admiration for the people who have the ability to have complete and all-encompassing knowledge. I admire them, and I envy them, I admire them and regret enormously much that I do not also have such qualities,but the aspiration for global knowledge crushes me because the universal aspect is the only one in which I fully believe. To calm myself, I am drawing from my memory the short belie that it is impossible for a single mind to master more than a minute specialized fragment of the sum total of universal knowledge.

Believing that the synthesis of acts and theories is an adventure, even if I have only incomplete and second-hand knowledge about some of them, I shall continue to communicate them as long as I have this opportunity through the amiability of the leadership and workers of the prestigious cultural magazine, TRIBUNA, even at the risk of becoming ridiculous in the minds of those who do not give their name when we talk on the phone.

Good luck, dear citizen who called me without having the courage to tell me who you are and what you want; because I know something, I am perfectly well aware of how little I know.

That is all I wanted to say in my defense, asserting that for what I communicate through writing I am responsible and nobody else.

Chapter I

The Payment of Duties on Export and Import Goods

Section 1
General Provisions

Article 1. - The goods slated for export and import and the means of transportation that cross the state borders of the Socialist Republic of Romania are subject to the payment of duties.

Article 2. - The payment of duties on goods and transports involves the following operations:

a) the presentation of transports and the accompanying transport documents at the customs units;

b) the customs control of the transports;

c) the declaration of the goods and the presentation of these goods for the payment of duties;

d) the customs control of the goods;

e) the check of the customs declaration and the setting of customs tariffs; the granting of customs clearance.

Section 2
The Presentation of Transports and the Accompanying Transport Documents at the Customs Units

Article 3. - At border crossing points, transporters of goods slated for export or import or the representatives of these transporters are required to present themselves, together with the accompanying documents, to the customs uni s.

Article 4. - For railroad transportation, the railroad organs are required to present the train's dispatch orders to the customs unit at the border station after the train has entered the country. The presentation of the dispatch order is done within the timeframe outlined for the technological handling of trains arriving from abroad.

Upon departing from the country, the dispatch order is presented to the customs unit prior to the train's departure within the timeframe established for the technological handling of the train in order to cross the state border. This time period will be at least 1 hour.

The dispatch order contains the number of each railcar, the bill of lading, the amount of goods and their names in Romanian. Upon leaving the country, this order will also show the number of the customs document and the issuing customs unit.

Article 5. - In transporting goods by highway, the transporter is required, upon the vehicle's entry or departure from the country, to present the vehicle's registration certificate and the documents accompanying the goods.

Article 6. - In transporting goods by sea or by river, the commander, the owner or the ship's agent who is transporting goods that are to be unloaded or transloaded is required to turn over to the customs unit, within 24 hours of docking, the original copy of the cargo manifest and to leave a copy of it.

When unloading or transloading operations are not going to be carried out, it is not necessary to leave a copy of the cargo manifest.

For ships loaded with bulk goods and instead of a cargo manifest, the commander, the owner or the ship's agent can present a notice that will give data to identify the cargo.

Article 7. - The cargo manifest will contain the number of each consignment or martime bill of lading or baggage receipt, the stamps and identifying names of the crates, and the name, quantity and, as the case may be, the gross or net weight of the goods, as well as the names of the supplier and the recipient.

Ships' agents are required to note on a copy of the cargo manifest the name of the goods in Romanian.

Article 8. - The commander, the owner or the ship's agent is required to leave at the port's custom unit a declaration of on-board provisions within 12 hours of the ship's docking. For strings of powerless-vessels in-tow, a single declaration of on-board provisions can be submitted for the entire convoy, with specific lists for each vessel.

Ships that stay for less than 12 hours and do not carry out unloading, loading or transloading operations are exempted from the requirement to submit a declaration of on-board provisions.

In those cases where ships are required, in accordance with the law, to stop at Danubian ports to be cleared into the country the on-board provisions declaration is submitted immediately.

Article 10. - In the on-board provisions declaration, the commander, the owner or the ship's agent is required to declare to the customs units the following types of goods found on the ship:

a) weapons, munitions, explosive materials and psychotropic, intoxicating and toxic products and substances;

b) other goods that are prohibited from entering or leaving the country in accordance with the law;

c) tobacco products and alcoholic beverages belonging to the ship and its crewmembers;

d) stores and unused items of current use that belong to the ship;

e) unused goods and goods that are not of a personal use that belong to the crewmembers, as well as their valuable items.

The goods outlined in letter d) are not listed in the on-board provisions declaration if they are listed in the ship's documents.

The goods outlined in letters a) and b), as well as the tobacco products and the alcoholic beverages are maintained under a customs seal during the entire in-port period. The customs organs can also place a customs seal on other goods.

Article 11. - In transporting goods via air, the provisions referring to the ships' cargo manifests are applied appropriately, with the timeframe for submitting them being 3 hours.

The aircraft commanders are required to declare to the customs units any intoxicating, psychotropic and toxic substances and products on-board the aircraft.

Article 12. - The customs organs can request the submission of a provisions declaration in the case of transport categories other than ships from those persons who are responsible for these types of transports.

Article 13. - In transporting goods via the mail or by messenger, the mail organs and, as the case may be, the railroad organs are required to present a list of mail sacks or packages to the customs border units.

Section 3
The Customs Control of Transports at the Customs Border Units

Article 14. - The customs control of transports at the border crossing point is carried out at the customs units at the border by customs teams established according to the law, and it consists of identifying the means of transport on the basis of the accompanying documents.

Article 15. - In transporting goods via the railroad, the customs organs, in the presence of the railroad organs, check:

a) the existence of the railcars recorded in the dispatch order. When the customs organs find differences in the number of railcars, the Romanian railroad organs are required to appropriately modify the dispatch order;

b) the exterior of covered railcars that contain goods by checking the integrity of the seals, the windows, the roof, the walls and the floors;

c) the interior and the exterior of open railcars that contain goods;

d) the exterior of the locomotive, the engine room and the engineer's cab.

Article 16. - Railcars that do not meet the sealing conditions and railcars that have seals missing or seals that have been opened are also subjected to an interior customs control. Similarly, the customs organs check the goods contained in these railcars. The Romanian railroad organs complete an identification document which is also signed by the customs organs. This same procedure is also applied to mail sacks and packages.

If the seals are not those that were applied at the time of shipment, the organs check for the existence of the documents attesting to the placement of new seals. If the documents are missing, the customs organs note this fact on the train's dispatch orders and conduct an interior control of the transport vehicle and the goods. The results of this control is reported in a report.

The identification documents and the reports noted in this article are completed in accordance with international railroad regulations.

Article 17. - In transporting goods via highways, the customs organs check the exterior of the vehicle, the driver's compartment and, if need be, the refrigeration equipment. For highway vehicles not carrying a load, an interior check of the compartment is also made for goods.

If during the exterior check of the vehicle the organs find that seals are missing or that the seals applied at the time of shipment have been tampered with or the cargo compartment was tampered with, they conduct an interior check of the vehicle and a check of the cargo. The customs organs give the results of the control in a report on their findings, which they sign and give to the transporter, as well as a report on the customs declaration.

Article 18. - The customs organs can carry out the customs control at one of the customs units within the country's interior when the appropriate conditions do not exist for a customs control at the vehicle's point of entry into the country. In these cases, the vehicles transit the country under a customs seal or are accompanied by a customs official to the nearest customs unit in the interior of the country, in the direction of the vehicle's destination, where conditions exist for a customs control.

The transportation and goods handling costs, as well as those to cover the customs organs' travel, are paid by the transporter.

Article 19. - In transporting goods by sea or by river, the customs organs conduct the control upon the ship's arrival, after the health check.

The customs check upon a ship's arrival is conducted in the presence of the organs of the harbor master, the owner, the commander or the second officer, as well as the representative of the shipping agency.

Article 20. - The customs control upon a ship's arrival consists of an examination of the cabines, rooms, larders, restaurants and engine rooms in order to determine if there is agreement between the on-board provisions declaration and the actual goods that are subject to declaration. At the same time, the commander, the owner or the ship's agent give to the customs organs the original of the cargo manifest.

Article 21. - After conducting the arrival customs control, the customs organs leave for the use of the commander, the crew and the passengers the usual amounts of tobacco products and alcoholic beverages, depending upon the length of time the ship is to be in port and in accordance with the criteria established by the General Directorate of Customs.

The commander or the owner is required for the period of the ship's stay to use only those provisions and goods recorded in the on-board inventory and is responsible, together with the ship's agent, to the customs organs for any shortages or substitutions for the declared goods, as well as for any undeclared goods.

The customs organs make note on the on-board provisions declaration regarding any removal or introduction on-board the ship of goods subject to declaration and about any goods that are maintained or removed from under the customs seal.

Article 22. - When a ship unloads or loads goods in two or more Romanian ports, the customs organs in these ports make notes on the original copy of the cargo manifest regarding the operations that are carried out.

The customs organs verify the notes made in the ports where the ship has docked previously and receive a copy of the cargo manifest.

The provisions in paragraphs one and two also apply to the on-board provisions declarations.

Article 23. - The commander, the owner or the ship's agent is required to notify the customs organs of the ship's departure at least 6 hours in advance for the purpose of conducting the customs control.

The departure customs control consists of verifying the situation of the on-board provisions and the agreement between the cargo manifest and the customs declaration or the customs permits that were issued.

Article 83. - The percentage amount mentioned in Article 82 letter c) is established by the units authorized to carry out foreign trade operations and represents the average amount of transportation and insurance costs over the enterprise's foreign routes for the previous semester by group of products and type of trade.

Article 94. - Goods that are slated to be sold for hard currency are levied customs duties upon being imported at the moment they are released from customs, but without the payment of customs duties, according to the provisions of this regulation.

If, after levying customs duties at the time of import on goods slated to be sold for hard currency, these goods are directed to other purposes, customs duties will be owed.

Article 112. - Foreign goods can be released into customs custody on the basis of a release-reception report for a timeframe established by the customs organs, with guarantees for the customs duties. The conclusion of these operations is carried out in accordance with the norms contained in this section.

Section 2
The Storage of Goods in Warehouses

Article 113. - Foreign goods can be stored temporarily under customs supervision, with guarantees for the customs duties. For these goods, storage fees are owed, which are levied by the units having the storage areas, in accordance with the established charges conforming to the legal norms regarding prices and tariffs.

Article 114. - Requests to the units authorized to carry out foreign trade operations for the storage of goods are presented to the General Directorate of Customs for notification and to the Ministry of Foreign Trade and International Economic Cooperation for approval.

The storage of goods in warehouses that are not the object of foreign trade activities is approved by the customs organs.

The approval for storage can authorize that the goods in storage be sorted, tested, treated, packed, marked or subjected to certain similar operations.

The timeframe for holding goods in storage is established in the storage approval. Extension of this timeframe is granted by the organs that gave the storage approval, upon a justified request from the party involved.

Article 115. - In the case of removing goods from storage, the party involved in the operation is required to submit within 5 days the necessary documents for the purpose of completing the customs formalities appropriate to the new destination.

The storage customs declaration constitutes an executory title for collecting the customs duties owed.

Article 116. - The parties involved in the storage are required to maintain records on the stored goods.

The customs organs have the right to verify whenever they feel it is necessary the documents regarding the storage and the goods being stored.

Article 117. - Goods, including supplies, unloaded from ships wrecked or damaged in the national or territorial waters of the Socialist Republic of Romania are subject to the provisions regarding storage.

Article 118. - The transloading of goods covered by customs can be done directly from one means of transportation to another or through the temporary storage of the goods.

Article 119. - Transloading operations are carried out under customs supervision within the area of the customs units.

In cases of necessity, the customs organs can approve the transloading of goods in other locations.

Transloading is done on the basis of a permit issued by the customs organs.

Article 120. - In railroad stations where the transloading of goods from railcars having different rail guages takes place, the transloading is done without a permit under customs supervision. The transporter is responsible for the type and quantity of the goods transloaded.

Article 121. - In the case of force majeure or technical defects in the transport vehicle, the transloading can also be done in locations where customs organs do not operate, but in the presence of militia organs or those of the local state administration.

Article 122. - After carrying out the transloading, in accordance with Article 121, the customs documents and the transport documents are appropriately modified and are approved by the customs organs, which will take the measures to seal the transport vehicles.

Section 4
Customs Transits

Article 123. - Goods that are not assessed customs duties upon their entry in the country can be transported under customs transit on the territory of the Socialist Republic of Romania under customs supervision, between two customs units, with guarantees for the customs duties in accordance with this regulation.

Those goods for export that have cleared customs in the interior of the country are considered under customs transit until they reach the border.

Article 124. - The clearing of goods in transit consists of an exterior customs check of the transport vehicle and a check of the agreement between the customs transit documents and the accompanying transport documents.

In case of suspicions, the customs organs also conduct a customs check of the goods in transit.

Article 125. - The parties involved in the transit are the transporters of the goods. They are required to present a customs transit declaration, directly or through their representatives, to the customs organs.

The customs organs can request that the customs transit declaration be accompanied by specifications or invoices which show the value of the goods in transit. The customs transit declaration is approved by the customs organs.

For goods of the same type found in a single transport vehicle and having a number of transport documents and a single destination, a joint customs transit declaration is submitted.

The data recorded in the customs transit declaration must agree with that in the accompanying transport documents and the other documents.

Article 126. - For goods cleared for export in the interior of the country, the customs transit is conducted on the basis of an export customs declaration, without being subject to confirmation by the customs organs at the border.

Article 127. - The General Directorate of Customs can order an exemption on the submission of the customs transit declaration for complete railcars contained in trains whose destination is the territory of another country and which travels on the territory of the Socialist Republic of Romania with changes to the trains' consist.

In the cases listed in paragraph one, the transport document, stamped with the words "TRANZIT VAMAL" [Customs Transit], takes the place of the customs transit declaration and has the same effects.

Article 128. - The timeframe for the goods brought into the country and transported in-transit is established by the customs units according to the type of transport vehicle and the destination of the goods, up to 45 days.

Within the framework of the established timeframe, the party making the transit is required to present the goods, together with the customs transit declaration and the accompanying documents, to the destination customs unit, which will confirm the receipt of the transit to the unit that issued the approval for transit, within 15 days.

Article 129. - The customs transit declaration constitutes the executory title for the payment of customs duties in cases where the transporter does not present the goods to the destination customs unit within the timeframe established or presents them with some missing.

In these situations, if there are no documents attesting to the price, the in-customs value is in all cases considered to be the average price by ton and group of products charged within the framework of import or export operations by those units authorized to carry out foreign trade operations and which are communicated to the customs organs upon request.

The customs unit that issued the customs transit declaration levies the customs duties that are owed after it has requested information from the destination customs unit regarding the arrival of the transiting goods.

Article 130. - A transit can also be accomplished between a customs unit and the headquarters of an import-using unit on the basis of approval from and respect for the procedures established by the Ministry of Foreign Trade and International Economic Cooperation.

Article 133. - In-transit goods that are used on the territory of the Socialist Republic of Romania are subject to authorization from the Ministry of Foreign Trade and International Economic Cooperation.

Goods cleared for export which can be used directly are exempted from authorization if, in advance, a request was made to annul the customs declaration.

Article 140. - The conditions necessary for the proper operation of customs supervision and control for the free ports and zones are ensured by the administrations of these ports and zones by joint agreement with the customs organs.

The free ports' and zones' administrations are required to notify the customs units in writing regarding the measures they have taken with regards to the prohibited goods found on transport vehicles that are to carry out operations in the free ports and zones.

Article 141. - The goods subject to customs are placed under a customs seal, with the exception of parcel post deliveries, in-transit postal sacks, goods placed in storage and those that are the object of temporary introduction or removal operations.

The seals applied by Romanian legal entities or foreign legal entities can be assimilated by the General Directorate of Customs by the application of customs seals.

The conversion of foreign prices into lei in order to establish the in-customs value is done, according to legal norms, under the conditions established in the order from the minister of foreign trade and international economic cooperation.

The model of the receipts that are issued of the purpose of applying the customs duties exemptions listed in this annex is established by the General Directorate of Customs.

56. The provisions in Article 57, letters f) through j) in the Customs Code are applied on the basis of certain documents that show the fulfillment of the conditions established for granting customs duties exemptions.

Annex No 5

Norms Regarding Determining the In-Customs Value of Goods Belonging to Natural Persons

1. In the in-customs value for goods brought into the country is determined by taking into consideration the level of domestic retail prices set for such goods or for goods having similar characteristics from domestic production or from import.

2. For goods whose in-customs value cannot be established according to point 1, the in-customs value is determined on the basis of the foreign price stamped or printed on the goods being evaluated, or in the absence of these prices using those listed in catalogues, brochures or other documents giving the foreign prices for such goods or goods having similar characteristics. These prices are converted into lei according to the provisions of this annex.

3. The General Directorate of Customs will complete lists of domestic retail prices or, as the case may be, lists of prices contained in catalogues, brochures or other foreign price docunents for the purpose of the customs organs' determining the in-customs value of the goods. These lists will contain the prices of certain types of goods frequently brought into the country.

4. The list of catalogues, brochures and other documents on foreign prices will be approved by the Ministry of Foreign Trade and International Economic Cooperation.

The General Directorate of Customs can annually revise the lists of prices according to changes in prices that occur for these goods.

5. The determination of the in-customs value in lei, as established on the basis of foreign prices, is done at the rate for non-commercial operations in effect on 31 December of the preceding year.

For hard currencies for which a rate of non-commercial operations has not been established, these currencies are converted into U.S. dollars at the rate communicated to the customs organs annually by the National Bank of the Socialist Republic of Romania, after which they proceed to convert it into lei at the rate for non-commercial operations.

6. When the payment of customs duties is done in hard currency and the in-customs value of the goods brought into the country is established according to point 2, the customs duties listed in the customs tariff schedule are applied.

When the payment of the customs duties is done in hard currency and the in-customs value of the goods brought into the country is determined accroding to point 1, the value in lei is converted into hard currency in accordance with the provisions in point 5, paragraph one or two, to which the customs duties in the customs tariff schedule is applied.

7. Depending upon the intensity of the customs traffic and the variety of the goods brought into the country, the minister of foreign trade and international economic cooperation can establish a simplified evaluation procedure, including the application of the in-customs value unique to certain products or groups of products, for the purpose of clearing the goods belonging to natural persons through customs without delays.

8. The in-customs value of automobiles brought into the country for which the payment of customs duties is done in hard currency represents the retail selling price of the vehicle in the country of origin based on the year of production, as listed in the price books. In the absence of these books, the invoice price for a new automobile is taken into consideration.

The in-customs value of automobiles adapted for use by ill or handicapped persons, for which the payment of customs duties is done in lei, represents the price in paragraph one converted into lei in accordance with point 5, paragraph one and increased by 100 percent.

9. For goods brought into the country by natural persons, the transportation, insurance, packaging and handling costs are not included in the in-customs value and allowances and rebates of any type are not taken into consideration.

10. In in-customs value of goods removed from the country represents the domestic retail price, as established according to legal regulations.

In the absence of purchase invoices or vouchers, or if domestic retail prices have not been established for the goods, the customs organs determine the in-customs value by comparing them with goods having the closest characteristics that have a domestic retail price.

If the in-customs value cannot be established by comparison, the natural persons will present estimations by the selling unit, second-hand goods units or units of the Art Fund, as the case may require.

The in-customs value of the goods removed from the country for which customs duties are paid in hard currency represents the price of the goods listed in purchase invoices or vouches, when this is expressed in hard currency or the purchase price is converted into lei at the rate outlined in point 5 paragraph one. The customs duties listed in the customs tariff schedule are applied to this value.

Annex No 6

Norms Regarding the Customs List and the Determination of the Origins of Goods

I. The Customs List

1. The customs list used in the customs tariff schedule for imports contains the names of all the goods that are involved in international trade, classified by sections, chapters and positions according to their material nature, degree of processing, destination and operating principle.

2. The titles of the sections and chapters in the list have only an indicative value. The tariff level is determined in accordance with the text of the position and the explanatory notes of the sections and chapters in the list, on the basis of the general regulations listed in this chapter.

3. An incomplete or unfinished product that presents the essential characteristics of a completed or finished product is placed within the position in the list which refers to that product.

These provisions are also appropriately applied to the completed or finished product when it is in a disassembled or unassembled condition.

4. Comments regarding a material within a position in the list refer to this material, either in its pure state or mixed or association with other materials.

Any reference to a product made from a certain material concerns the product made completely or partially from this material.

5. When the product can be placed in two or more positions or subpositions, the placement is done according to the following:

a) the position or subposition that is the most specific has priority over those of a more general nature;

b) goods made from mixtures and items composed of different materials, whose placement cannot be made according to the rules in letter a), are placed according to the material or product that gives it its essential nature, when it is possible to make such a determination;

c) in cases where the rules in letters a) and b) point to a number of positions capable of containing a product, it is placed in the position with the highest number.

6. Goods that cannot be placed on the customs list according to the rules outlined in points 3 to 5, will be placed in the position or subposition of the most similar products.

7. When the specification of imported goods contains a large number of positions, the importer can propose, for economic reasons and with the approval of the user, the grouping of the goods under a restricted number of tariff positions. The proposals are submitted for resolution to the General Directorate of Customs.

8. The listing rules established in this chapter are also appropriately applied to the customs tariff schedule for goods belonging to natural persons.

II. The Determination of the Origins of Goods

9. In determining the origins of imported goods, the following criteria are kept in mind:

a) the criterion "of goods produced entirely in a country" when only one country enters into consideration in determining the origin;

b) the criterion "of substantial transformations" when two or more countries take part in the production of the goods.

10. The following are considered "goods produced entirely in one country:"

a) mineral products and other products obtained from the ground and underground of that country, including from its territorial waters, as well as from the ground and underground marine regions under its national jurisdiction beyond the limits of its territorial waters;

b) vegetal products harvested in that country;

c) animals born and raised in that country;

d) products obtained from animals in that country;

e) products obtained from hunting or fishing in that country;

f) products obtained from ocean fishing and other products extracted from the sea by ships of that country, as well as products obtained from on-board factory-ships of that country;

g) waste and refuse stemming from production and processing operations, as well as goods that cannot be used, collected in that country and which can serve only in the recovery of raw materials;

h) goods obtained entirely in that country from the products listed in letters a) through g).

Goods produced entirely in one country are considered as being from that country.

11. Goods produced in two or more countries are considered as being from the country in which the goods are subjected to certain substantial production and processing operations which confer upon them characteristics for placement in the customs tariff schedule at a different position from that of each of the materials used in making the goods.

12. Exceptions to the provisions in point 11 are:

a) production and processing operations which, although they require a change in the tariff position, are not considered as being substantial or are considered substantial only under specific conditions;

b) production and processing operations which, although they are considered substantial under specific conditions, do not require a change in positions in their placement on the customs tariff list.

The determination of the nature of the substantial operation is done by the customs organs, taking into consideration the production operation which gives the article its essential characteristics.

13. The accessories, spare parts and tools destined to the used on a machine, device or vehicle are considered as having the same origines as the machine, device or vehicle wich which they are imported and normally sold, and they correspond in type and number to the usual equipment of these items.

14. Goods imported in a number of transport vehicles, in an unassembled state, are considered a single product for the purpose of establishing origins.

15. Packaging is considered to have the same origins as the goods that it contains.

In cases where the packaging is separately declared from the goods, the origins of this packaging will be established on the basis of the rules in this chapter.

16. In order to determine the origins of goods, the origins of energy products, installations, equipment and other tools used in production and processing of the goods are not taken into consideration.

17. "Substantial operations" are those operations in which the non-originating products give the finished product less than 50 percent of its value.

18. The following operations are not considered "substantial operations" and do not confer upon the product the status of a product originating from one country:

a) the marking, stamping or attachment of another distinctive name on the product or its packing;

b) the assembly of the pieces of a product in order to make a complete product;

c) the slaughtering of animals in a slaughterhouse;

d) the simple mixing of products, of different types or not, where one or a number of components of the mixture do not meet the legal conditions for attributes of origins;

e) the changing of the packaging and the separations and creating groups of goods;

f) the dusting, coloring, screening, sorting, classifying, pairing, washing, painting or any other simple finishing operation;

g) the ventilating, airing, drying, refrigerating, sorting or any other operation that ensures maintaining the goods in good conditions;

h) the packaging of goods;

i) the combination of two or more operations specified in letters a) through h).

19. In order to establish the origins of goods, the importing units present, upon the request of the customs organs, a certificate or origin in which the empowered authorities or organizations that can determine the origins certify expressly that the goods originate from a certain country.

The data that must be mentioned in the certificate of origin are established by the Ministry of Foreign Trade and International Economic Cooperation.

The certificate of origin is requested by the customs organs when it is necessary to impose differentiated customs duties according to the origins of the goods.

CHANGES IN OPSTINA LC ORGANIZATION IN MACEDONIA

Belgrade BORBA in Serbo-Croatian 3 Dec 81 p 3

[Article by Dragan Nikolic: "Life Prompts New Solutions"]

[Text] Without a doubt, the Opstina conferences of the League of Communists have achieved significant results in their past work. However, the level of organization in places has not been satisfactory, above all because the opstinas have worked without adequate links to the party base and to the basic organizations. Because of this the activities of communists here and there have not been successfully integrated.

In programming and in establishing the content and the methods of work, the opstina conferences have done quite well in exceeding the forum activity. All topics, from economic stabilization to problems of internal communication and communication in general, have found a place both in the programs and in the activities of these conferences. Now there is the realization that in the past they were not sufficiently engaged in problems of education, culture, social policy, and the development of self-management relations. Experience has indicated, however, that some of these problems are essentially important for politics and security, such as education, and that others are of fundamental importance for total economic and social stabilization. These are problems of self-management, and political system development and especially delegate system development. Now, these areas are being given top-level priority according to what was said several days ago at the meeting of the Central Committee of the Macedonia LC. Weaknesses have been noticed in the activity of communists in self-management, political, and especially, the delegate system activities.

The Weaknesses Which Must Be Eliminated

In a pre-congress discussion which is being conducted, quite a few words have also been spoken about the role of the committee in implementing the tasks of the conference. Evaluations indicate that the committees, as political and executive organs of the conference, have been acknowledged as the agents which direct and coordinate activity. With a reduction in the number of members, the committee's action and collective work has become more effective. However, in some places more, in others less, the focus of the activity in the opstina has been transferred itself, whose organ it is. Taking into consideration that the conference rarely has met in such conditions, the committee has gained in importance, its role and party authority have become stronger.

In the total scope of activity being developed in the opstina party organizations, activist groups of Communists and direct producers occupy an important place. They have significantly contributed to strengthening the class and revolutionary party direction, they have discussed many important questions of economic, political, and self-management development.

Here, for the most part, there should not be anything which needs to be added or done away with. There is one thing, however, which is not satisfactory, their self-initiative. They have had a tendency to discuss what is offered to them to a greater extent than what they themselves have set in motion and proposed. This, of course, is one of the causes of passivity, both of some activist groups as well as of individuals in them.

In several opstinas, the party organization has not successfully achieved Communist unity. In these circumstances, self-management has not been developed, but factionalist activity and the struggle for power have broken out. In these circumstances, most often communication between social and political organizations has not been achieved, there is also disunity in associated labor. Self-management becomes a matter of mere form in most cases, and it is then understandable that there is so much legal arbitration. There are also similar occurrences in some organizations of associated labor. In some places this type of activity is overcome (Combined Agricultural-Industrial Farm "Prilep") and in others it gets out of control (Surgical Clinic in Skopje).

It is alleged that communication of information has not been satisfactory. At one meeting of the Commission for Organization and Development of the Presidency of the Central Committee of the Macedonia LC, which was discussing the activity of the opstina organizations, it was noted that from the opstina more information was coming in concerning the fact that there were no detergents, or that some raw materials were in short supply, than information about actual political conditions.

Directions of Change Are Delineated

In party organizations in the opstinas, past experience is being used to improve the present. On the basis of these discussions, as on the basis of decisions recently made by the Central Committee of the LCY, a decision has been prepared concerning important innovations in the organization of opstina organizations of the Macedonia LC, which will be proposed to the Central Committee on December 10. A new format will be introduced by this decision: the opstina conference, as the highest party forum in the opstina, will meet every four years to evaluate the work of Communists in the preceding period. It is to be composed of delegates from the basic organizations, and it will pass a program of work for the following period and choose an opstina committee which will be the highest organ of the party organization. The opstina committee will choose the presidency from its ranks which will be a collective, political and executive organ, as well as a president of the opstina committee. The presidency will choose a secretary from its ranks and an executive secretary from the composition of the committee.

The number of members in the committee and the presidency, as in the commission for statuatory questions and supervision, will be established by decision of the opstina conference in agreement with the Presidency of the Macedonia LC.

Elections for the delegates of the opstina conferences will be held in February of next year, and the selection of the organs will be carried out a month later.

With good reason, it is expected that after these changes the conditions will be provided for greater ideological and working unity of Communists in the opstina, and with this a greater effectiveness in their political activity as well. With these changes, one of the former inconsistencies will be eliminated also, the fact that the opstina conference itself submits the reports on its activities.

NEW LC ORGANIZATION IN VOJVODINA OPSTINAS

Belgrade BORBA in Serbo-Croatian 3 Dec 81 p 3

[Interview with Marija Zvekic Miskolci by Slobodan Stanojevic of BORBA Conferences," place and date not given]

[Text] On the basis of the authority given in the last meeting of the Central Committee of the LCY, preparations are quickly being made in the Vojvodina LC in order to create new, highly modified forms of organization and activity of the LC in 50 Vojvodina opstinas not later than 15 January of next year.

The essential changes consist of the following: the opstina election conference is being organized as the highest party forum in the opstina, and the opstina committees will take on the role of the former, often criticized, opstina conferences between the two election conferences. Its former role as the executive and political organ of the LC in the commune now is "bequeathed" to the presidency of the opstina committees.

"With the new manner of LC organization in the opstinas it is necessary to create conditions to enable all basic organizations and the total party membership to have greater influence in the creation of party policy and in establishing the priority of assignments in the opstinas, as well as to work more successfully in carrying out mutually agreed upon working goals," said Marija Zvekic Miskolci, member of the Presidency of the Provincial Committee of the Vojvodina LC, and president of the Commission of the Presidency of the Provincial Committee of the Vojvodina LC for the Development, and the Ideological, Political, and Organizational Construction of the LC, in an interview with BORBA.

A Small "Party Congress"

[Question] In what way will these changes be brought into party work? Responding to this question, Maria Zvekic Miskolci says:

[Answer] Up to now, the opstina conferences themselves have, in practice, evaluated their own work during the last mandate, and have themselves established the program for future tasks. Both one and the other were carried out without the broader influence of the party membership. This time it is necessary to make an important change: the establishment of an opstina election conference, which will, in essence, be a small opstina party congress; it is necessary to create conditions so that practically the entire party membership is included in the evaluation of past work and in the establishment of the subsequent work program. Because the election conference will be made up of delegates from all basic organizations of the LC in an opstina, this means that discussions concerning these documents will have to be conducted beforehand in all party organizations. In other words, what has been done will be evaluated, and what is to be done will be agreed upon with a broader and more unified point of view.

These election conferences, as the highest party forum, will be convened every four years. In these conferences, a report on the work of the opstina party organization and its organs during the past four year period will be received, the program bases of the ideological and political activity of Communists for the next four years will be established; the opstina committee will be chosen, as well as the commission for statuatory questions, the supervisory commission, the delegates for the party conferences and congresses, and candidates will be nominated for offices in the organs of the LC of Vojvodina, the LC of Serbia, and the LCY. The new manner of organizing the election conferences and the sphere of activity of its work is necessary, as might be expected, in order to provide for broader and more democratic discussions in the opstinas concerning total party involvement and conduct.

We expect that in this way the organization of the opstina election conference, with delegates from all basic organizations, will provide a great deal of stimulation for the work of all party organizations. And in those places where there are several hundred basic organizations each in the opstina organizations, they will not be allowed to create a 'parade' from the election conferences, but a working group instead which, if necessary in order to provide for a broader, more democratic discussion of the delegates, can organize its work both in a plenum or by commissions. In other words, it is essential that mutual evaluations be concretely provided and unified agreement be established concerning future common working activity.

The New Role of the Opstina Committees

[Question] At the moment when the Central Committee of the LCY authorized the republic and provincial committees of the LC to implement changes in party organization, election activity was in full swing in the Vojvodina LC. In the basic organizations it had almost been completed. Moreover, the basic organizations had already chosen a number of members of the coming opstina conferences of the LC which were being discontinued by the new organization. Similarly, the process of reducing the number of delegates in the opstina conferences in Vojvodina was also underway; from the earlier number of 100, 150, and even more delegates, the opstina conferences had to be reduced to between 45 and 85 delegates.

Have the present changes "annulled" the election activity which had taken place up to now in any way?

[Answer] No, not in any case. since election activity is continuing in those places where it was going on. In other words, instead of the opstina conferences, opstina committees will be chosen in the future which will have at most 85 members. The delegates who were chosen up to now in the basic organizations for the new structure of the opstina conferences will now, to a certain extent, change their "status"; that is to say they will become only candidates for future membership in the opstina committees. I say only candidates because the new opstina election conferences have the role of an election body, and they can either change or supplement the proposals which have come from the basic organizations.

[Question] What will be the new manner of activity of the new opstina committees and their presidencies?

[Answer] We expect that with a structure of 85 members at the most the new committees will be much more mobile and effective in their work than the former opstina conferences, which were quite unwieldy. In addition, they will be convened more often during the year and thus will be able to conduct the activities of all Communists in the commune with greater success. Moreover, the opstina committees themselves will not be establishing the tasks to be worked on (which has been done up to now by the opstina conferences), because in practice they will be receiving them from the entire membership through the election conference. Similarly, we expect that the presidencies of the opstina committees (which "inherit" the former committees) as political and executive organs, will work with greater responsibility both before the committee and before the election conference, and this also means before the entire membership.

[Question] Which activities will especially gain in intensity?

[Answer] We strongly believe that these changes will not only contribute to the greater influence of the membership in the formation of party policy, but also will result in the greater presence of the party organs of the opstina in the basic organizations. When I say this I do not only mean the physical presence of members of the committee and its presidency, although it is necessary to develop this vital and direct contact to a much greater extent than it has been in the past, but above all in making the working connections stronger.

"We expect, then, that in the future the internal party connections in the opstina party organizations will be far more developed than they have been in the past. And this will be accomplished especially through formats which have been inadequately utilized up to now, the theme conferences, consultations, activity conferences, activist groups, and other forms. Until now, let us assume, the opstina conference did not usually organize an activity or a thematic conference concerning problems of great concern to all in the areas of culture, public health, education.... In the future, this should be able to be accomplished. Because we foresee that in our statuatory format, by which these problems will be regulated, instead of the expression "I can" for these forms of activity, we will insert the words "I promise."

In this way there will be greater responsibility of the opstina organs for the better utilization of all forms of active connection between the Communists of an opstina in order to solve the problems which are of concern to all.

Great Cadre Change

[Question] The new manner of organization in the Vojvodina opstinas will not, however, change decisions made earlier about cadre policy, or about the selection and the duration of the mandate of the basic cadres. Thus, the presidents of the opstina committees will be chosen from the ranks of the committee for one year, and cannot be chosen again for a period of four years. The secretaries of the presidencies of the opstina committees will have a mandate of two years, and the selection of the executive secretaries is possible for four years.

[Answer] The new presidents of the committees in all 50 opstina party organizations will be chosen at the end of this year and the beginning of the next, since the one-year mandate for all the former presidents expires at that time. Those secretaries who began the first year of their two-year mandate at the end of last year will, for the most part, be the only former secretaries of the opstina committees who will remain and occupy the positions of the future secretaries of the presidencies of the opstina committees, and because of the new elections the mandate will now be discontinued. All in all, these will be the great cadre changes which will include many new cadres in party activities from associated labor, prepared to struggle for the implementation of mutually established tasks in the LC.

PRIMA DONNA MUNITIC REMINISCES ABOUT LATE PRESIDENT

[Editorial Report] Followers of the ups and downs of prima donna Gertruda Munitic will be pleased to learn from an interview in Belgrade ILUSTROVANA POLITIKA in Serbo-Croatian 8 December 1981, pages 42-43, that her operatic career has been going well. The Split soprano has regularized her private life, having married a Montenegrin who works at the Titograd radio station, but she can also be enigmatic: "Why am I not in Belgrade more often? I do not know, or rather I know, but let us pretend that I do not know, maybe it is better so. I have just been saying that time heals all."

Munitic is unstinting in her admiration for the musical perspicacity of the late President Tito, for whom she sang "frequently"--and no wonder, for her art "was able to impart the joy of living [zivotna radost] to him." President Tito's favorite song was "Far Away Is My Pearl of the Sea," from the Croatian operetta "Little Florami," by Tijardovic. Munitic describes President Tito as an outstanding connoisseur of music, who was "unfailingly capable of deciding what he liked" about a particular singer. "I once ventured," Munitic says, "to inquire what he esteemed in my singing. He thought that over for a while, and then he said, in exactly these words: 'Gertruda, you are the symbiosis [simbioza] of voice, diction and charm. You have combined all of those in your person, and that is why the whole world just has to see you.' I said to him next, 'Yes, Comrade President, that is a wonderful idea, and I would gladly go out into the wide world, but then who will sing for this own folk of ours?' Comrade Tito was silent for a long while. When he finally spoke up, he was very serious. 'Right you are! Sing for our folk and our folk will reward you. But whenever you can, represent this Yugoslavia of ours, even if only twice or three times a year.'"

No evidence is on the record as to the musical tastes of Mme. Jovanka Budisavljevic-Broz.

Munitic, who has repeatedly stated that she "becomes" the characters that she plays on stage, remarks at the conclusion of the interview that she is thinking of doing the Broadway musical "Evita."

HISTORIAN DEDIJER IS ATTACKED, DEFENDS SELF

Critical Commentary

Sarajevo SVIJET in Serbo-Croatian No 1224, 16 Nov 81 p 4

[Editorial by Zlatko Dizdarevic: "History From Below"]

[Text] It is not uncommon in one's life for a man to carry feelings in himself for days, to know where they come from and where they lead, to see their roots and the sap that feeds them, and yet perhaps be unable to fully express them in words, arguments or anything precise and tangible. Such are the feelings, pent up in our very being, our identity here, that have been appearing as we have returned countless times these past days to the pages of "Novi prilozi za biografiju Josipa Broza Tita" [New Contributions to the Biography of Josip Broz Tito], which truly is the book we are reading the most. It is well known that the book was written by Dr Vladimir Dedijer, member of the academy. A member of Russell's court. President Tito's biographer, as it is put. By virtue of its significant historical material, then, this is a book which will enrich the world with valuable new truths about Tito and about us ourselves, just as there has been much that was exceptionally important in what Dedijer has written up to now.

However....

Dedijer says, and he has every right, that history cannot be dressed up. That is true. And it is a good thing. Dedijer also says that "our society is pluralistic, there are diverse aspirations and diverse interests within it" in explaining why people take differing views of "Novi prilozi...." And that is true. Just as it is true that he is proud of having consistently followed Tito's devotion to the "idea of truth, justice and fairness." And he also says this: "I am very proud that I have written this book freely in my own country. I believe that I am the only man who has managed that, and I want other authors to win the same right for themselves...."

In a conversation with the member of Russell's court conducted a few days ago one was reminded that in gathering material for the book we are reading the most and which is "not a description of a Pharaoh, in which the tone and style of hagiographies is absent...," he was aided by Roosevelt's wife and the secret correspondence between Hitler and the Japanese and by pearls from the British archives and documents from old Soviet cellars, but also by "an individual thought to be reliable," and by Rankovic, whom Dedijer knows to be "as cunning as water is wet," and by Djilas, there it is, was "hasty" in expressing an "adverse opinion about the wives of certain of our high Yugoslav leaders." That same Djilas of whom Dedijer even today, in 1981, says in the presence of foreign newsmen: "Here and now I still stand by the position I took in defending Djilas in 1954."

We are grateful to all of them for their services so that today we could have the book that is most read in the country. Dedijer probably will also express gratitude to that "reliable individual" who told him about Comrade Jovanka Broz's washing machine so that he could "put it into the book in order to arouse the reader's interest in the third and fourth volume which are to come." The member of Russell's court will be grateful to all those who made it possible for him to "feel a bit like Agatha Christie." Many will also be grateful to him for this book. But since "our society is pluralistic, and there are differing aspirations and interests within it," perhaps we might say, and forgive us if we say it with pride: Our interest is not the same as that of Mrs Eleanor Roosevelt, nor that of the British archives, nor that of Russian papers, nor indeed that of Rankovic and Djilas. Perhaps we have not yet reached that level of "historical distance" from Comrade Tito as to prove with our most private life, expressed through "reliable individuals" that we belong in the ranks of the "great" and "worldwide" newspapers and reviews. Who knows, perhaps we have not even reached that level of understanding of history so that today, just 1.5 years after Comrade Tito's death, as well as in the future, we do not think the most important thing is to pass on to the very young the reasons why Tito divorced Pelagija and, imagine how tragic it is, we do not reliably know how that happened, just as, pity, we do not reliably know certain other things which will be revealed to us in the volumes to follow by certain other "reliable individuals."

Most probably we will be accused of the blackest dogmatism for all this by those who do not understand that their own liberalism is a textbook example of dogmatism in our context, just as we have been accused because we have been "striking the angels of freedom and democracy" in condemning Djogo, for whom even Dedijer has found "understanding." Perhaps because his sentiment of a "love of freedom" is in line with the "theory of distance." Even though that distance amounts to only 1.5 years.

Let one thing be clear, history will not be altered depending on whether this thing or that thing is written about or not. Everything that should be known, let it be known and recorded. But, for pity's sake, are details about the private life the largest truths about a man who created history through his life and deeds, are the key pieces of evidence of his "magnanimity" in his letters to Davorjanka Paunovic? Is the truth about Tito's Yugoslavia in Dedijer's saying that he is "the only man who managed that and wants other authors to win the same right for themselves"?

Alongside Tito we have learned in this country certain other truths about attitudes toward people which perhaps do not conform with the criteria of the world archives and the reflections of certain "reliable individuals." Perhaps for that reason we are not great and worldwide in that we love in a bit different way, so that we can say: Let history have its own in the books and archives. Let everything be recorded. But leave us our own understanding of love, of human greatness and of devotion. Without rummaging around and banalization in the name of a "history which cannot be dressed up." Which accounts for that feeling of nausea in the face of "history," which after all should serve man, and not itself, and particularly not sinister, luciferian and in a subtle way petty bourgeois motives. Least of all those who are opposed to the pillars of that history.

Discussion in Subotica

Belgrade ILUSTROVANA POLITIKA in Serbo-Croatian No 1205, 8 Dec 81 pp 24-25

[Account by Stevan Zec of a lecture delivered by Vladimir Dedijer at the Workers' University in Subotica: "I Ask Neither Forums Nor Friends"]

[Text] The large auditorium of the Workers' University in Subotica was packed. People were standing in the balcony and behind the last rows, there were two to a seat in some places, and there were people squatting along the wall. They even filled the lobby that leads into the auditorium. Many of them did not even see the speaker, the historian and member of the academy Vladimir Dedijer. But they could all hear him well. The sound system was first rate. Dedijer had come to Subotica to promote his book "Novi prilozi za biografiju Josipa Broza Tita" and the new edition of his old wartime "Dnevnik 1941-1945" [Diary 1941-1945].

"I came to Subotica on purpose both because this city is one of the centers of Hungarian culture and also because Tito's work is continued in practice and most obviously in communities like this where the lives of many nationalities are blended together. Tito is what is happening this evening," Dedijer said and turned to the wall behind the stage and indicated the slogan written in Serbo-Croatian and Hungarian, "Tito is that equality of languages."

Promotions of a writer's new book--in this case the book of a historian--are arranged so that the public can become personally familiar with the writer, can see him, and also so that the author can see those for whom he has written the book. Of course, there is also a commercial aspect, since after such meetings the writer usually gives autographs on copies of the book which have just been purchased. Meetings like this arouse attention, since the public expects to hear even what the writer did not wish, did not manage or did not dare to say in the book. For several hundred people of Subotica this was precisely such an occasion.

That same day, on Thursday, 26 November 1981, there was a meeting of the Information and Public Opinion Section of the Federal Conference of the SAWPY which debated the increasingly large scale of publishing activity related to the name and deeds of Josip Broz. It was said that this activity is often taking on undesirable characteristics, from the purely commercial to an unscholarly and superficial approach, which is evidence that the views and principles adopted on the use of the name and deeds of Josip Broz Tito are not being respected. It was said in this connection that not all the undertakings of publishing organizations have been consistent in making the required evaluation of the quality and advisability of every work published. For example, the list of books published in the last 2 years which have been given some kind of public accreditation does not include Dedijer's "Novi prilozi za biografiju Josipa Broza Tita."

"You Will Earn Piles of Money"

The citizens of Subotica who went to see and hear Dedijer were not aware of this judgment, since the news was carried by radio and television only late that evening and by the daily newspapers the next day.

Vladimir Dedijer spoke in his introduction about his missions to Baghdad and Tehran where he went as a judge of the Russell court.

He told anecdotes about how there was never enough ink during the war, about how he could never be objective in assessing the movement of Draza Mihailovic because he has a wound in his knee from a Chetnik bullet, and other anecdotes already well known to a broad public of his fortunes and misfortunes while, as he put it, he was scribbler in the Supreme Staff of the National Liberation Struggle and Partisan Detachments of Yugoslavia. Straightaway, at the very outset of the talk, he said that he did not see well with his right eye, that he was rather deaf, indeed that he easily became excited and wept, and if that happened: "Forgive me," to which several voices responded in unison: "We forgive you in advance." However, this did not happen to Dedijer. He insisted that every member of the audience who put a question to him state his nationality and occupation.

"That is so that I can learn something from you as well, so that I can know who is asking me what and why," Dedijer said.

Vladimir Dedijer, who is skilled as a speaker, was able on that evening to arouse spontaneous laughter, tumultuous applause, but also audible resentment and disagreement in the audience, especially when he spoke about Milovan Djilas. During the discussion one could not escape the impression that Dedijer was actually not answering questions from the audience, but had sections of a speech prepared in advance which he arranged and delivered according to his own plan. For example, in response to a very concrete question: "Would you like to explain why you fell into political disfavor in 1954 and under what conditions you were rehabilitated in the mid-sixties?" Dedijer answered briefly, "All that is written in my book, read it, my lad...."

In response to the request: "Tell us something about the First Session of AVNOJ [Antifascist Council of the National Liberation of Yugoslavia] in Bihac, which began on precisely the same date in 1942," Dedijer answered:

"On 7 November 1942 in Bihac we celebrated the anniversary of the October Revolution. I went to Tito and asked him to sign his name in my diary. He signed his name, looked at me and said: 'Listen, Vlado, you will make piles of money after the war writing books about us and our revolution.' I did not think that we would ever get out of those hollows in Bosnia and thought that we would all die there, but, of course, I never said that publicly. So I answered Tito: 'Listen, Old Man, I make a gift to you of all the royalties from the books I write after the war.' Tito laughed and told me to remember what I had said and that he would hold me to my word. When the war ended, I kept that promise, and I am still keeping it."

Often it was rather difficult to see the connection between Dedijer's answers and the questions; we will quote the most interesting passages of what he said....

"The uprising in Lika involved large numbers of people thanks to the activity of the party. A great deal of the credit for this goes to Comrade Jakov Blazevic. I do not say this because he is now in power, since it is well known that I have a habit of picking on those in power, but rather I say this because in the case of Lika it was important that the party manage to create an organization in almost every village. Jakov Blazevic was for years secretary of the CPY for Lika, so that certainly his role here is large. On the other hand, the uprising flared up spontaneously, since the people did not want to submit to the knives of the Ustashi, and the party was able and ready to lead a popular rebellion. How did the members of the party manage that? By applied ethics, that is, by personal example. The communists were the first in the assault, they were the first to go hungry, if it was necessary, they were the only ones to go barefoot.... Lika was the only area in Yugoslavia where the uprising and fighting were constant from 1941 to the liberation. Brotherhood and unity between Croats and Serbs developed there in the true sense. The bright example of Lika is still greater because in neighboring Kninska Krajina, where the party was not strong enough, in spite of glorious examples, there was a strong Chetnik movement, there were Ustashi, and there were devils of every stripe."

Institutes Curry the Favor of Forums

"Historical distance is not a theory of mine. This is the theory of all intelligent men, and above all of Josip Broz. When I wrote his first biography 30 years ago, he emphasized in a letter to me: 'You arranged and noted all the facts accurately, but for an overall evaluation of our struggle a certain historical period has to pass, and only then can the final conclusions be framed.' Tito himself said that the time has not yet come to publish certain things. These are events whose disclosure might threaten the security of our country or hamper our relations with certain states, especially the Soviet Union. As to when something should be published, I am not the only one who decides according to my conscience, but I have many friends who give me advice. I do not ask any forum, and I have even written that I am not writing this book jointly with any forum or with any individual. It is certain that not everything one knows can be published even now. Look at the practice in other states. In England there is a law whereby documents may not be published until 30 years have passed. In France the period is 50 years. For example, all the participants in the French resistance movement wrote a declaration on activity during the war. This has been sealed, and it must wait 50 years. Incidentally, Tito often said that only future generations would make a true evaluation and render a true judgment of our revolution. Even in his own collected works in 1977 Tito repeated that thought, but much more broadly and with more supporting arguments. In any case,

I have kept that letter of Tito's from 30 years ago like a deed. For me it is like an icon. At the same time we have various flatterers. Those flatterers feel that if they begin to praise and curry the favor of those in power, if they make pharaohs of them, that they themselves will derive some benefit and advantage. Various of our institutes of history which are writing so-called contemporary history are like that in that they curry the favor of people in power. Unfortunately, they are my fellow historians. They get money from the budget, from what is taken from the pay envelopes of the workers. They get nine-tenths of the money earmarked for the study of our contemporary history. And what do they do? By and large they give lectures on how to write. But not one of them has the guts to sit down and say: Now let's see and let's write it down. No, they only give lectures, they curry the favor of various forums--and that is their principal job. These people would swallow me down with a glass of water. And that suits me just fine! (Laughter in the auditorium) I am constantly imploring them not to praise me whatever happens....

"The historian must constantly check the facts of what he writes and then check them again. He should not even put much trust in himself. I once asked Comrade Tito: 'Now, Old Man, why do you give three different birth dates in your biography?' He said: 'Look here, Vlado, there were 15 of us kids, who was to know when each one was born?' On one other occasion Tito reproached me: 'Why did you write that I repeated the first grade of elementary school?' And I said to him: 'Go and look at the documents, Old Man, you did stay back, that's all there is to it." Then Tito said that enemy propaganda would take advantage of this as a political datum against him and Yugoslavia in general. 'Like hell they will,' I told him. 'Listen here, Vlado,' Tito said, 'you had it easy, you were a bourgeois child, your mother brought you hot cocoa in bed. But I was up before dawn to drive the cows out to pasture. I was on the lookout for the cow to shit so that I could step in that hot dung and warm my feet. I went to school after all that was done....' Then I said: 'Listen, Old Man, let me write all that down.' And Tito said with a wave of his hand: 'Go to hell, write what you want.' Tito was a great man, but he was also able to shout at me when I annoyed him. Then I would stay out of his way. He was sudden and could fly into a temper. After a day or two he would call me in: 'What did you mean by that?' Tito did not bear a grudge."

Dudic on an Empty Stomach

"On the occasion of the 40th anniversary of our revolutionary the original diary of National Hero Dragojlo Dudic was published. I found it and received tremendous and decisive aid in that task from the Yugoslav People's Army. I wrote in the preface of the original edition that that diary of Dudic's was the greatest and best historical witness of our war, since this was history from below, about ordinary people. At one point Dudic says: 'No food for anyone now for 2 days. The detachment came into a village, the peasants brought out food, I wouldn't know how to describe the quality of the food. It is a strict rule with us that the noncommunist Partisans eat first, then the Partisans who are members of the party, and then, if anything is left, the commissars, the commanders and the commanding officers.' So, you see, it was because of that approach to things that we were victorious in the war, that we drove out the occupier and changed social relations. On one occasion I was to say: 'Now, 40 years after the war, this diary of Dudic's ought to be printed in an edition of 2 million copies and presented to every member of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia, and he should have to read it every morning on an empty stomach, before breakfast, like reciting Our Father who art....'" (Applause in the auditorium)

Ideologies Like Shirts

"There are no problems: just let everyone write his remarks about my book, and I will publish all that. Just as I have published what was said by Hebrang, Zujovic, Rankovic, Djilas and Ceca Stefanovic.... And that includes Blagoje Neskovic. And let Svetozar Vukmanovic Tempo write down his remarks. Even though some have made mistakes here and there, we are still all Tito's children, so let every one of us speak out and write it down, and let the people and the readers be the judges, pass the verdicts and act as filter. Let the people decide, but not political organs and forums by any means....

"I haven't read Tempo's talk in the Petar Kocic Library in Belgrade, which was published in ILUSTROVANA POLITIKA, but I heard something about his doing some writing. Let Tempo write that down and send it to me, and I will publish it in the new edition of my book....

"Djilas has written more about our revolution than any of us. Much more than I have. Djilas suffers a bit from a disease which has also infected me. We come from up in the hills, and that means that we are what are referred to as violent characters from the Dinarids. That means that we are accustomed to gaze on Lovcen Mountain, and we don't see anything lower down. We like to look at our busts and to polish them all day and enjoy ourselves. Djilas is sick with a disease called narcissism. (Hubbub in the auditorium and one member of the audience saying: "And surely that isn't all.") His writing about others is mixed, but when he starts on himself, he is like the male grouse, he sees only himself, and he tells such fat lies, you know, that it's a real wonder. In the mountains where we come from people lie so convincingly, the sun is so clear there, the imagination so lively, and you get to believing even your own lies, like a little child. And that's the case with Djilas. (Still greater clamor in the auditorium, and then that same voice asks: "What is this man saying?") Djilas says that he carried out an execution in Nova Varos on Tito's order, and I dug out Tito's letter which was sent to Djilas: 'Don't carry out executions, think it over. Every man means an entire life. Do not render a verdict solely on the basis of one fact or suspicion, but weigh everything and take the case before the company conference. Let it render the judgment. And then let the decision wait overnight. Only then, in the morning, if necessary....' SVIJET of Sarajevo is attacking me saying my book is pro-Djilas, and on the other side I received an article from a Chetnik newspaper in London NASA REC saying that my book is anti-Djilas. So now let them figure out what is actually the case." (Clamor in the auditorium: "How dare he compare one of our newspapers with an emigre newspaper?")

"Who set fire to the village Zagarac in Montenegro? Well, it was we who did it in 1942, and not halfway either. Now, Djilas lies through his teeth about Zagarac. He accuses Peko Dapcevic and I don't know who else for having ordered Zagarac burned. But I have Djilas' letter. Some people from the Niksic committee said: 'Let us not burn Zagarac.' But Djilas interrupted them: 'This is not social democracy! I am issuing an order: Burn the village!' And now that same Milovan Djilas is a great Social Democrat. Actually he is to be pitied, he changes ideologies as I do my shirts. Actually he is a restless soul like Maksim Crnojevic." (Hubbub in the auditorium once again)

When he felt that he had satisfied the audience's curiosity, Vladimir Dedijer said:

"That is enough for this evening. Forgive an old man, he's tired...."

As the audience was leaving the auditorium, Dedijer came up to me:

"Tell Tempo, my boy, to write me about that, and I will publish it. Just let them attack me! The more they attack me, the better the book sells."

JIRI PELIKAN COMMENTS ON POLISH CRACKDOWN

PM381515 Rome AVANTI! in Italian 20-21 Dec 81 p I, Current Affairs and Culture Supplement

[Article by Jiri Pelikan: "Warsaw Like Prague: Different Tactic, Same Substance"]

[Text] A week after General Jaruzelski's military coup it is still too early to assess the entire extent of the tragedy or to forecast its possible developments, partly because of the lack of information caused by Poland's total isolation. But the known facts--the martial law, the de factor outlawing of the Solidarity Trade Union, the rigid censorship and above all the arrest of Lech Walesa and tens of thousands of citizens and the first losses of life by workers--enable us to make some initial observations.

The military coup is not a response to the latest decisions that emerged from the meeting of Solidarity's national leadership, as official Polish propaganda states, but had been planned for a long time--at least since General Jaruzelski's election as party first secretary and perhaps for much longer. The "operational armed forces groups" which Jaruzelski sent to all the country's important locations in October were part of thispainstaking preparation for the coup: They drew up lists of people to be arrested and prepared plans for the occupation of the trade union's offices and the evacuation of the factories. Only thus can one understand how within minutes of the declaration of martial law in the middle of the night thousands of Solidarity members and intellectuals had been arrested, the borders hermetically sealed, the television and radio stations occupied and the factories surrounded by tanks. While following the famous three-way meeting Jaruzelski accused Walesa of sabotaging the negotiations and at the same time planning to seize power, this week Poland discovered the truth, namely that it was General Jaruzelski himself that was pretending to want to negotiate while in fact gaining time to plan a military coup that would find Solidarity and Walesa himself unprepared and surprised.

Despite General Jaruzelski's claims that they are only temporary measures pending a normalization and that the regime does not want to return to the pre-August 1980 situation but intends to carry out the economic and political reforms, the aim of the operation is precisely the opposite of all this, namely to destroy the Solidarity Trade Union by trying to split it into good guys and bad guys and forcing Walesa himself to make the workers endorse the military coup. The same method was used after the stifling of the Prague spring, when the Soviets used Dubcek to halt the people's resistance and, having discredited him, politically destroyed him. But for the time being Walesa refused to play this part. Even Husak proclaimed in 1969 that he wanted to salvage the reforms and military putchists--yesterday in Chile, today in Turkey--have justified repression by the need to establish order "against" chaos and anarchy.

But eventually they transform temporary repression into a permanent system. Borders are closed and censorship is imposed only when the intention is to govern with methods that must remain unknown to the public. Poland, which in recent months was the most open country in the Eastern bloc, is now the country most isolated from the rest of Europe, and the generals want to transform it into a kind if European Kampuchea.

Anyone who has followed the Soviet leader's attitude toward Poland's renewal process can have no doubts that General Jaruzelski's operation is the result of Soviet policy. Moscow has never concealed its hostility toward the new Polish course and in particular toward Solidarity and has indicated--both publicly, in various statements, and in negotiations with the Polish leaders--the need first to halt and then to eliminate the results of the Gdansk agreements of summer 1980. The only innovation is the change of tactic: Instead of "normalizing" Poland with his own military intervention, Brezhnev preferred to throttle it with Polish hands because he realized that this time the price to pay for such an intervention was too high both on the international plane (the end of detente and of the Euromissiles negotiations and economic agreements) and on the national plane (the fear of Polish resistance and of another Afghanistan). Back in May the well-known Soviet "journalist" Victor Louis indicated military dictatorship as the only solution to the Polish crisis, pointing out that the Polish armed forces belong to the Warsaw Pact and are commanded and controlled by Soviet marshals. Such an operation could not have been prepared without the Soviets' knowledge or without their consequent backing. This also explains the presence of Soviet General Kulikov, commander of the Warsaw Pact forces, in Warsaw during the coup. In the future, too, the USSR will do its utmost to avoid an armed intervention of its own, which would, however, be needed only if the Polish police and armed forces were unable to control the situation and to eliminate the resistance on their own.

This is why we consider any argument based on the "internal" nature of the change in Poland to be hypocritical and unacceptable. Indeed, as far as we socialists are concerned, the suppression of freedom and repression are never "an internal affair" to which one can remain indifferent. This is one reason why we have always been vigorous defenders of the principles of the Helsinki conference, including nonintervention in another state's internal affairs but also the principles of observance of human rights, trade union freedom, freedom of information and the citizens' freedom of movement within their own countries and abroad. We cannot therefore restrict ourselves--as some European statesmen do--to appeals for observance of the Helsinki accords solely in the field of interstate relations, but must also reject the military coup and its repressive measures as contrary to the overall spirit of those accords. The latest reports from the European conference in Madrid confirm our anxiety that all that has happened in Poland since Sunday will have harmful effects on the positive conclusion of this conference and also on the Geneva Euromissiles negotiations, in which we take such a great interest and to which we are so committed.

For the same reason we must consider hypocritical any argument--such as we have heard in the past few days from Mrs Thatcher in Strasbourg and from other European and U.S. statesmen--that "the Poles must resolve their own problems." How can "the Poles themselves" discuss and resolve when the army and armed police, with orders to shooot--and there have been casualties already, though only on one side--are on one side and the population, unarmed and without any rights, is on the other?

How can the prisoners discuss with those who keep them in prison and in the new concentration camps? Who would use the same argument in connection with the Chileans or the Turks? Who tells the Salvadoran revolutionaries to keep calm and not to resist the repression? We must condemn the military dictatorship in Poland, as we have condemned the dictatorships in Turkey, Chile and El Salvador; it is a principle that we have defended and intend to defend in the future, too, because there are no good and bad military dictatorships depending only on the various flags that they fly.

If the throttling of the renewal process in Poland is a huge tragedy for the entire Polish people and for all democrats throughout the world, its consequences are tragic above all for us who believe in the socialist ideal and who have watched the Polish experiment with high hopes of seeing the resurgence of the possibility of a form of socialism within freedom, which is a different kind of socialism from the Soviet one, which has been so discredited. Having witnessed the stifling of the attempts to democratize this model with gradual reforms and the backing of the ruling party--the most recent example was the Prague spring in 1968--we are now witnessing the destruction of an attempt at a self-managed form of socialism with the working class as the protagonist of this democratic and peaceful process. This poses with new emphasis the question whether the systems of so-called "real socialism" can be reformed, whether they are open to possible changes and developments. The past 18 months have created new hope and a positive answer can be given to this question. Unfortunately, after what has happened in Poland over the past week--which is the result of the long preparation and expression of a specific political concept--it would be a dangerous delusion to continue issuing a positive answer.

Poland will probably soon become another test for the communist parties and the entire Western left, not only in the stance that they adopt toward the repression but above all in their stance toward the new opposition to the military regime that will undoubtedly emerge from the remains of Solidarity and the other organizations destroyed and driven underground. Will this new Polish opposition be stronger than Czechoslovakia's, Hungary's or the Soviet Union's? Particularly bearing in mind its deep roots in the working class, with its traditions of struggle. The Italian Communists have shown in the past and over the past week that they can adopt correct political stances, as they did on Czechoslovakia or Afghanistan and now on Poland, but they have always refused to follow these stances with specific acts of solidarity with the various victims of Soviet policy. Will they now again restrict themselves to condemning the military regime, declining to help the Polish forces that will remain loyal to the renewal process and combat the military coup?

It is still too early to forecast future developments. But one thing is certain: The great hope of a different kind of socialism--self-managed and pluralistic--has been stifled by the brutal repression. After what has happened one cannot hope for real negotiations and reforms. The Polish people will probably continue their resistance to the military regime, but they lack the necessary means and foreign allies to reverse the situation. Moscow permits no concessions and indeed continues its pressure on Jaruzelski to eliminate the spirit of Gdansk and to use all the brutal repression to this end--if the first deaths, the arrests and the major display of military means prove insufficient. But if the resistance is tough and long-lasting the regime might be forced to make concessions and one cannot rule out a kind of Polish "Kadarism," as long as--and this is by no means certain--the military regime is able to substantially improve the economic situation with Soviet aid.

We have no right to advise the Polish people to "behave calmly" and accept the coup d'etat. But we must state clearly on whose side we are and urge the government, the political forces and the national and international trade union organizations to inform Poland's present leaders unambiguously that democratic Europe cannot accept the state of martial law, with its prisons and concentration camps, in Poland. As Secretary Bettino Craxi has said: "Nothing must be done that could seem like passive indifference, which would only encourage the repression."

Warsaw Radio, with its nationalistic and antisemitic tone, is trying to persuade the Polish population that it is abandoned and alone, citing ambiguous and unilateral statements by certain Western politicians. We must persuade the Polish population, through our attitude and our actions, that this is not so, that the Polish people's voice, their aspirations to the greatest freedom and justice, are heard in the thousands of demonstrations and in the factories and cities of our continent. The socialists must be in the front line of this major battle, which we urge all democratic forces to join.

YOUTH UNION OFFICIAL DESCRIBES U.S. TRIP

AU191321 Prague MLADA FRONTA in Czech 16 Dec 81 p 5

[Interview with Marian Grigel, head of Ideo-Educational Work Department of the Central Committee of the Socialist Youth Union (SYU) by Karel Cech: "The Emissaries of Our Youth; Talk with Marian Grigel About the SYU Central Committee Delegation's Study Visit to the United States;" date and place not specified]

[Text] Our Contemporaries

Recently a study delegation of our youth, led by Marian Grigel, head of the SYU Central Committee's Department of Ideo-Educational Work, returned home from a 3-week trip to the United States. After his return we asked M. Grigel to share with our readers his impressions and experience of the United States, which he and the other delegation members had acquired.

[Question] What was the purpose of your trip?

[Answer] At the invitation of our fraternal organization--the League of Young Workers for Liberation (YWLL)--we organized 35 concerts of the Slovak Vrchar [hill-inhabitant] ensemble in the state of New York and Georgia; and after the performances we talked to young Americans about the life of youth in our socialist fatherland. We performed in high schools, in progressive ethnic organization clubs, as well as in churches; of course, contrary to Europe, in the United States they often resemble social or cultural buildings, rather than churches. We landed in diverse environments; we met both students and working or unemployed youth; both white and black Americans; we were guests in the poverty stricken Bronx, as well as in luxurious villas in Roswell, an Atlanta suburb. Due to this we have gained, in my opinion even during the relatively brief time of 3 weeks that we spent there, an objective knowledge of the stances and opinions of contemporary America, and of its young generation in particular.

[Question] What have these meetings given you?

[Answer] We have convinced ourselves that the overwhelming majority of Americans are longing, the same as we are, for a life of peace. A number of them are nevertheless succumbing to the pressure of the bourgeois propaganda, which is intimidating them by speaking of the "red threat"; and that is why they do not realize that at the present moment it is above all the policy of the present American Government that is dangerous for world peace--the policy evoking the ghosts of the cold war of the fifties and further fanning out the armament race.

The picture which the young people in the United States have about life in the socialist countries was sometimes revealed by the unimaginable naiveness of the questions we were asked during the talks by otherwise educated high school students. I have made notes of some of their questions: For instance, do communists have horns? Are women rationed in your country? Does money exist in your country? Do the children in Czechoslovakia know sweets? Are the clothes you wear your own, or were you allotted them for the trip to the United States? Do you have compulsory school education?...

During the dozens of concerts and talks we met about 8,000 young Americans. Naturally, I do not think that our meetings succeeded completely in eliminating all the layers of lies and slanders which have settled down in their heads during all the years they have been under the influence of the bourgeois propaganda. However, I am convinced that we have at least partly opened the eyes of the overwhelming majority, and that the meeting with the "emissaries of our youth" has acquainted them with life in Czechoslovakia, a country so distant from them, and also with the merits of the socialist society, of which they had had no prior idea.

[Question] The YWLL, which is rallying the most progressive part of American youth, helped organize your trip. Did you get to know its activities in greater detail?

[Answer] Twice we met James Steel, the league's chairman; we were in close contact with the members of the organization in every place we visited during our stay in the United States. We have convinced ourselves of the complicated nature of the league's work and of the obstacles which it encounters at every step. It is all the more necessary to place the proper value on all its results. In talks with the leadership of the league we have also agreed on a number of further joint projects, among others also on the mutual travel of young people and on similar trips of our group.

Our stay in the United States has contributed toward better information for the young people of both countries concerned: and particularly toward acquainting thousands of young Americans with the life of their contemporaries in the socialist world. It was a specific example of our interest in deepening the acquisition of mutual knowledge among the young generations in countries with different social systems in the spirit of Helsinki--it was our contribution to the deepening of peace, cooperation and understanding in the world.

HUNGARY 'STRICT' WITH TOURISTS--Prague MLADA FRONTA in Czech on 23 December on page 2 carries a 600-word Libor Sevcik article entitled "Border Regulations." The author opens the article by saying that "recently all kinds of rumors have been spread throughout the republic about the Hungarian customs officials' strict measures against our tourists returning from trips to Hungary." He took the opportunity of a recent trip to Hungary, Sevcik goes on to say, to inquire into the "real state of affairs." He then reviews the valid customs regulations for tourists leaving Hungarian territory, confirming that the "regulations really are strict" and that they are "rigidly observed" by Hungarian customs officials. He lists the goods that may not be taken out of the country at all and stresses that, even when returning with goods that may be taken out of Hungary, Czechoslovak tourists must prove that they "purchased the forints officially, before setting out on the trip." If the traveler fails to produce such a proof or if he purchased his forints "on the side," Sevcik goes on to say, the Hungarian customs officials confiscate the goods transported by him. According to Sevcik, the customs officials are not even obliged to certify the confiscation, unless the merchandise in question is worth more than 500 forints. Sevcik notes that the "unpopular measures" especially affect people who "use the word tourism to describe a shopping trip" and that those who observe the customs regulations "need not fear any harassment." He also points out that Czechoslovak customs officials are "equally uncompromising" in applying the "strict" Czechoslovak regulations against Hungarian travelers. [Editorial Report]

OLSZTYN VOIVODSHIP PARTY PLENUM ACTIVITIES REPORTED

Report on Plenum Deliberations

Olsztyn GAZETA OLSZTYNSKA in Polish 10 Nov 81 pp 1, 2

[Article by Danuta Kolodziej-Gluchowska, Wieslaw Bialkowski, Stanislaw Jermakowicz]

[Text] [GAZETA OLSZTYNSKA's service] Yesterday a plenary meeting of the Voivodship Committee [KW] of the Polish United Workers' Party [PZPR] was held in Olsztyn. Politburo member, secretary of the Central Committee [KC] Kazimierz Barcikowski participated, as did the presidium members of the Voivodship Party Control Commission [WKKP] and the Voivodship Audit Commission [WKR]. The order of the day was made up of two parts: organizational matters and a discussion of the current economic, social and political situation in the voivodship. To the second part, which had a consultative character, representatives of the economic and social aktiv and PZPR, ZSL [United Peasant Party] and SD [Democratic Party] workers were invited.

Comrade Wlodzimierz Mokrzyszczak, candidate member of the KC Politburo, opened the deliberations. He turned to the members of the voivodship echelon with a request that they release him from his duties as KW first secretary, member of the Executive Board and member of the KW in conjunction with the function of KC secretary entrusted to him by the Fifth KC Plenum. Comrade Mokrzyszczk informed those present that he would ask his basic party organization in the Olsztyn Locomotive Shop to retain him within its ranks. He warmly thanked the Olsztyn voivodship aktiv for 7 years of cooperation, for the experience he had gained, and for the confidence his comrades had placed in him during the recent electoral campaign. "It is not easy to change one's place of work and to fulfill party and economic obligations in a new environment," he said. "Before coming to Olsztyn I worried about how I would be received here. Today I am moving on to other party work for a time. How well I did what you demanded of me is for you to judge. I tried to do solid work in executing my duties. No matter where I work, I will draw on my work experiences with my comrades in this voivodship." Comrade Mokrzyszczak assured that he would try to take part in the life of the Olsztyn voivodship party organization.

Next, Adam Weselak, KW secretary, assumed the chairmanship of the deliberations. In accordance with PZPR statute, he put W [lodzimierz] Mokrzyszczak's request to a vote. It passed, with two abstentions.

After reading the pertinent sections of the statute concerning the election of the KW first secretary, Comrade Weselak reported on the results of consultative meetings conducted within the regions on the topic of candidacy for this position. In the name of the Executive Board, W [lodzimierz] Mokrzyszczak announced the candidacy of Jan Laskowski, hitherto KW secretary for economic affairs. Next, the candidacy of the following was announced from the hall: Marek Sapinski, KZ [Factory Committee] secretary in the POLAM-FAREL plants in Ketrzyn, candidate member of the KC; Stanislaw Biczysko, commander of the MQ [Citizen's Militia] Higher Officers' School in Szczytno; Wladyslaw Dragun, director of the Morag PPGR [State Enterprise of the Agricultural Economy] and Mikolaj Malachowicz, who did not accept the nomination.

Many questions were asked of the candidates, both specific and general, concerning their party positions now and in the past, their attitude to the line of the Ninth Congress and to the resolution of the Fourth Plenum, as well as how they intended to implement party decisions. The candidates gave their answers to these questions. Since a motion was made not to place M [arek] Sapinski on the list of candidates, this matter was voted on once again, and the majority of KW members voted to place him on the list.

Elections were done by secret ballot. During the first round of voting, none of the candidates received the majority vote required by statute (50 percent plus 1), so the voting was done again and Jan Laskowski was elected KW first secretary. Two members were also added to give the full complement to the KW (in conjunction with the departure of comrades W [lodzimierz] Mokrzyszczak and Tadeusz Szacila, who moved to another voivodship). In an open ballot, two deputy members of the KW were chosen, comrades from the Olsztyn city party organization, which did not have its own representatives in the Voivodship Committee: Zbigniew Wrzesniowski, doctor of agricultural sciences, scientific worker in ART [Articultural-Technical Academy] and Kazimierz Jakubiak, a locksmith from OZOS [The Olsztyn Tire Plant].

The Voivodship Committee complied with the proposal made by the POP [Primary Party Organization] Executive Board in the Nidzica IZOLACJA Plants concerning the transferral of the case of Wlodzimierz Dabrowski and the suspension of his rights as a member of KW to the WKKP. The decision was unanimous in favor of this.

KW Secretary Adam Weselak reported on the work of the KW Executive Board and Secretariat for the current term, i.e., since May 1981. The idea central to the work of the KW Executive Board and Secretariat," said A Weselak, "was concern over overcoming the sociopolitical and economic crisis in the voivodship, improving food supply, materials supply and the supply of raw materials for production, means of production for agriculture, and an improvement in the living and working conditions of inhabitants of the region. The Executive Board made a thorough analysis of its position on 21 problems of importance to the voivodship and stated this position more explicitly. These are problems which concern such questions as socioeconomic issues and the current economic problems of the voivodship, problems of the food economy, intraparty work and ideological-upbringing work. The implementation of the resolutions and decisions adopted have had basic signifigance for rejuvenating the ideological-political actions of party echelons and organizations, as well as for stabilizing the socioeconomic life of the voivodship. Recently, the KW Executive Board and Secretariat have held many community consultations and meetings on current, working subjects. With regard, e.g., to the economic issues examined in August, the KW secretary mentioned such matters as preparing for the heating season and supplying the populace with fuel, accepting the voivodship governor's decisions concerning the distribution of fuel among the particular sectors, the undertaking of an operation to obtain wood fuel and many resolutions concerning an improvement in water conditions and the life.

Much consideration was given and is still being given to issues of supplying people with basic articles and regulating goods. Suggestions were received concerning raising the sugar allotment per person and approaching the authorities to increase the procurement price of slaughter animals. The issue of soap production in the voivodships and streamlining the distribution of laundry detergents were examined, as were the introduction of farm slaughtering on the PGR [State Farms] and on RSP [Agricultural Producer Cooperatives] to meet the ration allotment of the labor force, the introduction of the temporary sale of industrial articles on the basis of lists and the increase of production in small-scale production plants which manufacture for the local market.

Other subjects include: ideological-upbringing work and political training in new, changed forms, party activities associated with the introduction of economic reform, commissions to fight against speculation and the results of the inspection of buildings occupied by the administration.

In October, the KW Executive Board resolved to undertake the urgent preparation of a voivodship plan for the implementation of the tasks comprised by the resolution of the Fourth KC Plenum. The plan is consistently being implemented.

The report also contains data concerning the number of members in the voivodship party organization: as of 30 September 1981, it numbered 50,729 people, or 4,527 fewer than in January of this year. During the 3rd quarter of this year, 120 candidates were accepted into the party. Forty-seven people were dismissed. A total of 4,213 people was stricken from the list of party members.

The second part of the meeting, in which the economic aktiv and political parties took part, was opened by Jan Laskowski, KW first secretary. During this introduction, he characterized the sociopolitical and economic situation of the voivodship, which served to initiate discussion. He stated that the same unfavorable phenomena are occurring in all divisions of production as are in evidence in the national economy. While the production decline in the Olsztyn voivodship is only 10 percent lower, this represents 3 billion zlotys. Only two enterprises have attained last year's production levels--IZNS [[Ilawa Auto Parts Plant] and WSS [Voivodship Consumers' Cooperative]. The work cooperative achieves good results. Discussions have been conducted with the WZSP [Voivodship Union of Labor Cooperatives] to encourage the creation of new cooperatives and the development of existing cooperatives, the intent being job offers for the graduates of secondary schools.

Production in repair-construction enterprises fell by 12 percent, while farm construction declined by 28 percent, mainly due to limited cement, steel and fuel deliveries. Along with the decline in material production, the monetary earnings of the populace rose by 33 percent, and in October, by 43 percent (income from the sale of farm products increased by 54 percent). This continues to upset the market. Outlays for the purchase of goods and services rose by only 18 percent. The past few months have been very difficult for the Olsztyn Voivodship: the low allotments have prevented the total implementation of rationing for meat, sugar and soap powders. Changes have been introduced into the system of rationing fats, sweetners and alcohol. Work forces suffer from a shortage of cleaning agents, protective clothing and shoes. The procurement situation is difficult: for the 10-month period procurement was lower than for a similar period last year: namely, procurement of livestock for slaughter dropped by 22.3 tons (more than 20 percent), procurement of milk fell by 28 million liters (8 percent) and procurement of grain fell by 30,000 tons (more than 40 percent). The number of head of livestock is reduced, and deliveries are reduced despite the high, profitable price of livestock for slaughter and good harvests of grain and potatoes. Contracting between farmers and the government for supplying farm products has declined. This means a further increase in supply difficulties, particularly with regard to meat.

Farming in the Olsztyn voivodship has received less feed concentrates than last year, but yields were higher and the sale of grain and root crops, lower. Is the regression in agriculture observable only in the material sphere? Farming is also suffering the consequences of the crisis. While the deliveries of machinery and tractors are greater than last year, there is a shortage of fertilizers, means of crop protection, construction materials and coal. The decision to sell industrial articles in exchange for slaughter animals is being received with mixed feelings. Some assert that this gives preference to large farms; others say that there isn't anything to buy in exchange for slaughter animals anyway. There is likewise the fear that this will deepen the mutual dislike of the rural and urban populations and may lead to conflicts which should not arise.

J Laskowski stated that party members received the resolutions of the Fourth and Fifth KC Plena with hope, as an incentive to take the offensive more often. The understanding that a resolute political battle against the ideological opponent is necessary is growing. Echelons and many party organizations have apppointed groups of the aktiv to conduct this battle; many organizations are awakening from their lethargy, are analyzing their attitudes and views and are overcoming their defeatist attitudes. The course of the October strike is evidence of the victory of rational thought. Currently in party echelons and organizations, discussions are being conducted with the leadership cadre and party members who are violating the basic norms of party consciousness [partyjnosc] or who are demonstrating political passivity. The situation in the voivodship party organization is not a uniform one. There is a fair-sized group of active POP's in the larger industrial plants, but there are also those which do not manifest a greater degree of activism. These must be given support and assistance by KW members and the permanent apparatus. The streamlining of party information and propaganda is likewise indispensable. An information and analysis team has been in operation for a short time in the KW, but its materials do not always reach everyone on time.

The KW secretary reported on the meeting of the Voivodship Commission for Cooperation [WKW], which recognized as necessary the activation of the local National Unity Front [FJN] committees and the broadening of their social base to include those who acknowledge the systemic principles of our state.

Discussion

Adolf Teresiak, Olsztyn Meat Plants: After the Fourth KC Plenum, work in our POP was revitalized and party members are gradually regaining confidence. The democratically elected founding committee of the workers' self-government is 30 percent PZPR members. The work force did not participate in the October strike. Discussions are conducted with the party cadre, according to the Fourth Plenum resolution. It is better that there be fewer of us, but that we be confident and represent a monolith. In the past, the fundamental criterion for evaluating the POP was the number of its members. The discussions enable those who cannot handle the obligations imposed upon them to leave the party.

The speaker was critical of a GAZETA OLSZTYNSKA report ("Prisoners' Revolt" [Bunt wiezniow]) stating that this should be found in the EXPRESS [full title unknown] and not in the party paper. He likewise spoke of instances in which there was no reaction to the failure to economize, including the indifference of party members in various plants.

Wladyslaw Dragun, PPGR, Morag, spoke of the lack of convergence of words and deeds. Statements are made, e.g., from the Congress platform, concerning the need to treat farming in an equal manner, and in practice the direct opposite is done. The division in farming has increased--in whose interest is this? Private farmers can purchase colored televisions and other attractive items in exchange for slaughter animals, and PGR workers, who sell everything that they raise, are deprived of this. Socialized agriculture in the Olsztyn voivodship supplies more than 60 percent of the ration-card allotment of meat for the voivodship. The PGR's have been left with no defense. We have nothing to be ashamed of, but we should be judged fairly. We do not want to be conflict with the private economy: we have cooperated well with it--the results of procurement prove this. The employees of meat plants receive a meat allowance--from the hog that we fattened--and our workers must travel 15 km to town and stand in line for a kilogram of meat, purchased with rationing cards.

The speaker criticized the dearth of party information. He called for the party apparatus to extend itself locally, coming more often among work forces, into the POP, there to give assistance to party members in their political struggle.

Michal Zuk, first secretary of the PZPR KM [City Committee] in Ilawa, spoke on the interpretation of a point in the Fourth KC Plenum resolution concerning the self-determination of party members. The various interpretations of this problem indicate the need for an explanation on the part of the KC Politburo. He also spoke of the negative consequences of the uneven rationing of goods in various regions of the country, and even in cities and gminas. Referring to the GAZETA OLSZTYNSKA report entitled "Bunt wiezniow," he stated that the reporters could write the article in no other way, since authoritative information was refused them.

Lucyna Siemionek, representing the party organization in the CPN [Petroleum Products Center], stated that the effectiveness of PZPR actions depends primarily on activities within party ranks, because its strength derives from them. Much also depends on properly and rapidly arming comrades with information and arguments--a situation which still leaves much to be desired. Lucyna Siemionek likewise called attention to the drawbacks of supplying plants with meat for ration cards. Deliveries to stores, and then to plants, arrive late, at about the 14th hour, and by the time the package reaches the employee, the meat is no longer fresh. There was also a statement made that the prices of products and services should be regulated. It is impossible to agree that, for example, 3,500 zlotys should be asked for sewing a coat.

Michal Sawczuk, forestry inspector from Wichrowo, spoke of the difficult situation, indeed the state of disaster in the forest economy following the recent severe hurricane. Many trees which had been growing for 40, 60 and 100 years were uprooted. In the Wichrowo Forestry Inspectorate, which covers 26,000 hectares, there is approximately 200,000 cubic meters of wood to be obtained from the fallen trees. Otherwise it will go to waste. But there is a lack of equipment, motor fuel for the machinery and people. Thus the help of the army, which is trained in this type of work, is urgently needed. There is no shortage of wood for fuel in the forests either. There is enough both to supply those people who want it and schools, hospitals and nurseries. But crews from without are needed to fell the wood, since the forestry inspectorate is not in a position to supply even its retirees with the use of its own forces. (Relative to this problem, Jan Laskowski, KW first secretary stated that the viovodship anti-crisis staff should deal with this problem.)

The most important party task, in the opinion of Stanislaw Wiatrowski, first secretary of the PZRP KMig [City and Gmina Committee] in Nidzica, is the building of social understanding. Every party organization should ask itself the question: What should be done to bring about understanding, to get out of the crisis and begin to work? We can no longer continue to turn in place. The mass media should also serve the building of understanding. The preparation for economic reform in terms of regulations, especially financial regulations, should likewise be accelerated.

Jan Szwed, farmer from the gmina of Bartoszyce, said that he deplored everthing which sets the village against the city. In this context he proposed that the tied-in sale of slaughter meat deliveries be limited to the means of production needed by farmers, clothing and work boots, and not include goods such as colored televisions which people employed in industry likewise need. The sometimes false reports of a bountiful harvest also stir up conflict between the city and village. These reports suggest that the peasant is hoarding his food and does not wish to give it over to the state. Meanwhile in the north, because of excessive rainfall, potatoes and grain harvests have not been productive. Many tubers have been stricken by blight and have rotted or are still rotting. Some wheat plantations have yielded 15 quintals, although to the eye it seems that 40 quintals will be poured out. Nor does the future seem rosy, since there is a shortage of spare parts for machinery (how is the plowing to be done?), mineral fertilizers (at one time 350 kg of NPK [nitrogen-phosphorous-potassium] was sown per hectare, and now about 100 kg is sown) and chemical means of plant protection.

Next Kazimierz Barcikowski, Politburo member, secretary of the PZPR KC took the floor (a discussion of his address is included separately).

First secretary of the KW Jan Laskowski reacted to several of the remarks made during the discussion.

KW members elected the secretary of the Voivodship Committee for economic affairs. Elected to this position was Jan Malinowski, formerly first secretary of the KM in Ostroga, a greaduate of SGPiS [Main School of Planning and Statistics]. A second candidate was Zbigniew Wrzesinski, secretary of KU ART [College Committee of the Agricultural Technical Academy].

The recommendations made during the discussion are included in the resolution which was passed. This resolution was made by Krystyna Labacka in the name of the Recommendations Commission.

Biography of Jan Laskowski

Jan Laskowski was born in 1935 in Lipinki (Nowe Miasto County) into the family of a highway worker. He holds a master's degree in political economy. He has belonged to the party since 1954.

He began his socipolitical work in 1952, when he took on a position with the ZMP [Polish Youth Union] County Board in Ilawa. He then joined the Provincial Board of the same organization as deputy director of a department. After completing basic military service, he worked as senior officer in the Voivodship Enterprise for the Wholesale Food Trade in Olsztyn, after which he returned to his work with the youth movement, first in the ZHP [Polish Scout Union] Troop Command in Olsztyn and then as commander of the ZHP troop in Ilawa. After completing his studies in the Higher School of Social Sciences [SWNS] in Warsaw, he began his work in the party apparatus. Since 1965, for three successive terms he has been secretary in PZPR County Committees, first in Nowe Miasto and then in Ilawa.

In 1969 he became director of the Ilawa Auto Parts Plant (now IZNS) and has worked in this position until June of this year, until he was elected economic secretary in the PZPR KW in Olsztyn. Yesterday he was elected first secretary of the PZPR Voivodship Committee in Olsztyn.

Address at Olsztyn by Kazimierz Barcikowski

Olsztyn GAZETA OLSZTYNSKA in Polish 10 Nov 81 p 2

[Report on Kazimierz Barcikowski's 9 November 1981 speech to Olsztyn Voivodship Party Plenum]

[Text] What has been said at the Olsztyn Plenum to a great extent has anticipated what I wish to say. Above all, I totally share the conviction of Comrade Wiatrowski that the crisis will last as long as we allow. For us here today the crisis is already a smokescreen behind which we may hide our idleness, our lack of organization and our declining activity.... There is no crisis in a country in which there are 36 million people who want to get out of the crisis and who have the will to emerge from it. Our misfortune, of course, is that not everyone has yet decided to act in favor of getting out of the crisis. But be that as it may, in our party there must be the consciousness that neither has Poland in the interim become poorer, nor has it been destroyed by a natural disaster. What it has already achieved once it can achieve again, but only if we decide all together to achieve it. And if we merely talk about crisis and stand idle, the crisis will continue and it will get worse. The causes of the crisis also lie within the sphere of mental, social and political life. If this is so, then others may not succeed, but our party has every chance of rebuilding its status and winning social trust. For our party is, should be and can be that constructive force which will lead in getting us out of the crisis. We are not the only political force in Poland today, but we have every opportunity to be the only constructively operative political force. For in opposition to us there stands negation, often disheartening and often undermining the party's position. Society is beginning to have enough of behavior which undermines everything that has been done until now--destructive behavior. Even that which seemed attractive and fascinating 1 month, 2 months or 5 months ago today appears in the form of longer and longer queues. For negation has not yet resolved anything nor has it fed anyone.

That is why it is so important that a current of positive action be developed in our party. It is important that we learn to talk to people in their own language, telling them how to get out of this distress we are in. It is essential that people simply want to want. In order for this to be so, we in the party need much resoluteness much determination. And comrades, let's stop waiting for the Politburo to hand down a regulation on how party members are to go about the process of self-determination. In party activity, as in any kind of activity, the binding principle is that if someone wants to do something, he will look for a way, for methods in which to do it. On the other hand, someone who does nothing looks for an excuse. Of course, he will always find one. Some say that the mental effort required to find an excuse is no less than the effort to find a way to do it. It too requires the exertion of one's powers, but leads nowhere. Let us consider, then, how to do something.

Returning to the issue of self-determination, Comrade Barcikowski said: We must answer a very simple question, are we together with the party or are we against it, do we want to be in the party or do we want to leave it?

Referring to the Fourth PZPR KC Plenum resolution, Kazimierz Barcikowski stated that it cannot be considered in isolation from the resolutions of the Ninth Extraordinary Congress. The Fourth Plenum resolution is a stage in the concretization of what the congress established. To look at it in political categories and not only in terms of tasks, two fundamental lines of action are evident in it. The first is the struggle for the restoration of the operation of the law in Poland or, we may say, the struggle for law on the basis of the law. What this means is that the norms of social, public order begin to function, norms are binding and which have been shattered, trampled and have lost much in significance. By consistent action we must reach a stage in which none of us is outside the law, or above the law, or alongside the law. There is a second line--the line of political openness. It is represented by the proclamation to build a patriotic front of understanding, a front built out of the initiative of our party. What is important is that this front of patriotic understanding not remain an empty slogan or a slogan of the authorities. It is to be a slogan of our party reaching from the top to the very bottom. This is also why, from the viewpoint of our participation in the front of understanding, we should examine our own policy, our own behavior and work methods, having in mind the attainment of greater understanding for the party throughout society. We must learn to work politically, and not to lead the party to self-isolation, but to broaden its front of operation.

We must look at the meeting between Comrade Jaruzelski, primate Glemp and Solidarity chairman Walesa in light of this statement. Without entering into details and into the fact that various interests crossed at this meeting, it should be asserted that this meeting was both necessary and fruitful.

Undoubtedly, an important plane of understanding for all social forces in overcoming the economic crisis, steering the country in the direction of development and perceptibly improving living conditions. It is clear that in order to move economic matters we must move political matters. Today we are dealing with a dual blockade--the political situation paralyzing the economy and, in turn, economic paralysis deepening social dissatisfaction and creating tension. But in considering how to get out of the crisis, we must also see the real possibilities without creating a mirage of hopes which are impossible to attain even as they arise.

In speaking of our embarking upon economic reform, the KC secretary strongly emphasized pricing issues. The change in supply prices and in retail prices is one condition for improving the economic situation. Only then will money be something desirable, and market equilibrium something attainable. The farmers who spoke here were quite correct in saying that production is declining because people are losing interest in having money. The zlotys have lost their power to mobilize people to work. One hears opinions that a monetary devaluation may cure the situation. It will not. There cannot be such a devaluation which would hit people hard. It would mean the total breakdown of confidence in money. For this reason, the only way out is to realize a pricing policy and not to change the monetary system. Contradictory slogans also appear which declare: reform yes, price changes no. They suggest that supposedly it is possible to undertake a reform without reforming prices. This is impossible. But while prices are unrealizable, we must look for such stop-gap measures as the tied-in sale for deliveries of slaughter animals to purchasing centers. Perhaps this solution is not a good one, but [text illegible] a still worse one--compulsory deliveries. Opinion must be founded on facts, and it is a fact after the introduction of the tied-in sale procurement increased.

Referring to the statement about the paralysis in intraparty information, Kazimierz Barcikowski stated that in Solidarity propaganda carries because it runs with the current, although it is fundamentally based on half-truths and quarter-truths. We cannot use such methods of information, since we feel a responsibility for our words. This is perhaps the reason why party information is treated as less reliable than that of Solidarity.

The KC secretary, continuing the topic of informing society, said that the workday begins with the morning news report at 7 o'clock and people find out little more later by taking advantage of special information sources. This fact alone proves that we must have more confidence in the mass media.

Kazimierz Barcikowski also reacted to the issue of the difficult conditions which the party has encountered in such situations as those in which one hears rumors that it is going to be expelled from a plant. Attacks on the party and campaigns against it will continue, he said, until we stand tall and respond to these attacks with mettle. The party was born of struggle and it must once again learn to defend itself successfully and to act successfully. At the same time, it must also change its style of operations, aiming at greater effectiveness, and it must lead the struggle against evil, excesses and swindles, which action society will certainly recognize.

In his address, Kazimierz Barcikowski also commented on several statements made during the discussion. Referring to the remarks made by Comrade Dragun, concerning the delay in supplying PGR work forces with meat, he stated that there is much truth in this, although it is somewhat exaggerated. He pointed out, however, that when the PGR's had their own pork butcher shops, excesses occurred. Hence the question, should these butcher shops be reopened in farm enterprises, will there not be a wave of excesses, would this not represent a temptation to people hitherto honest? In answer to Michal Zuk, who proposed the equalization of ration-card norms throughout the country, he stated that food rationing is certainly not a just system. However, we must count on the fact that there are better possibilities for additional supply in agricultural regions such as Olsztyn than in Lodz or Slask.

The KC secretary also made reference to the critical remaks made during the discussion on the subject of the report on the prisoner's revolt in Kaminsk published in Monday's GAZETA OLSZTYNSKA. I read this article carefully, he said, and

I do not wish to offend my comrade reporters, but there is in this article much self-pity over the journalist's fate. It is touching to read of the difficulties reporters had in trying to reach the truth--a truth they did not reach. I myself considered what I would do had I been in the position of the officer in charge of the operation. I would not have admitted the reporters. What happened in Kaminsk was only minutes from being a great tragedy. In taking responsibility for such an operation, one cannot also assume responsibility for the safety of reporters. But I also would have found a place in GAZETA OLSZTYNSKA to censure this revolt.

ROLE OF CONFIDENCE-BUILDING MEASURES IN STRENGTHENING PEACE

Bucharest ERA SOCIALISTA in Romanian No 19, 5 Oct 81 pp 15-18

/Article by Ion Nicolae: "Role of Confidence-Building Measures in Consolidating Peace and International Security"/

/Text/ The concept of "confidence-building measures" as components of peace and world security is a relatively recent one in the theory and practice of international relations and is still in course of development. Although various efforts have been made on behalf of a climate of international confidence and stability in the last few decades in the course of bilateral and multilateral agreements in various areas of the world, measures to further confidence have been prepared and applied on the European continent for the first time on a regeional scale. Agreement upon such measures at the Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe was prompted by the very serious military situation in that part of the world.

Europe is the most heavily armed continent in the world today, a veritable military arsenal most seriously endangering the fate of all peoples in that region. The statistics of some strategic research institutes show that 80 percent of the total funds allocated to military purposes in the world today are being spent by the states that signed the Final Act. Over 10,000 of the 12,000 strategic nuclear warheads in the world are concentrated in Europe, as well as thousands of rockets with strategic and tactical nuclear warheads, over 15,000 combat planes, over 45,000 tanks, over 8 million men under arms, and military bases (land, sea, air or mixed) on the territories of 17 continentul states. Moreover the most powerful military blocs, whose existence fosters an atmosphere of fear, discord and animosity, are also confronting each other in Europe.

In view of the grave danger threatened by the vast concentration of troops and weapons in this part of the world, it is quite natural for the military aspects of European security to have priority in the efforts to create a climate of international confidence, security and peaceful collaboration. Building security and developing cooperation in Europe call for definite measures for military disengagement and disarmament that will protect the states on this continent from any act of force or outside interference and provide them with favorable conditions for peaceful, independent development. To this end the states attending the General European Conference also agreed to take simpler, political measures that would help to incease confidence in international relations and to promote detente, good will and general collaboration.

After some lengthy negotiations at the Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the Document on Confidence-Building Measures and Certain Aspects of Security and Disarmament was approved whereby some measures to increase confidence on the European continent were accepted. (1) The preamble to this document, in defining the complementary nature of the political and military aspects of security, points out the relationship between greater confidence among states and greater stability and security in Europe. In expressing the wish to eliminate the causes of tension, the document confirms the resolve of the states participating in the General European Conference to abstain from the threat or use of force against any state's territorial integrity or political independence in their mutual relations and in international relations in general. The preamble also stipulates that the states taking part in the conference recognize the necessity of helping to reduce "the risks of armed conflicts, misunderstandings or miscalculations concerning military activities... by providing clear and timely information..." The document includes such confidence-building measures as previous notice of extensive military maneuvers, previous notice of other military maneuvers, exchange of observers, etc.

At the special session of the UN General Assembly on disarmament in May-June 1978 the representatives of the quasi-majority of states pointed out in their comments the significance of the measures for greater confidence among states and the necessity of adopting them on both the regional and global levels. The importance attached to these measures was reflected later in the opinion agreed upon in the Final Act (Paragraph 93) to the effect that "The commitment (of the states -- our note) to agree upon confidence-building measures could help significantly in creating conditions for further progress in disarmament" (2). The Final Act, approved by the special session, includes the following among the confidence-building measures: preventing accidental attacks due to miscalculations or communications failures, in areas of tension especially, by establishing "direct telephone lines" and other methods of reducing the risk of conflict; evaluation by states of the possible effects of military research and development upon the existing agreements and upon future efforts toward disarmament; and periodic reports presented in the UN General Assembly by the secretary general concerning the socioeconomic effects of the armaments race and its very harmful effects upon world security and peace.

Thanks to the increasing interest taken by the UN countries in the confidence-building measures, the 33rd Regular Session of the UN General Assembly approved a resolution (No 33/91 of 16 December 1978) at the West German delegation's suggestion that was coauthored by 19 other states in various regions, including Romania. This resolution requested the states to notify the UN secretary general of their opinions and experience concerning the confidence-building measures that they considered appropriate and feasible. In reply to the said resolution 3 0 states sent their answers to the UN secretary general stating their positions and experience concerning the confidence-building measures (3).

At the 34th Session of its General Assembly the world forum approved a new resolution (No 34/87 B of December 1979) wherein it was decided that a group of government experts (4), appointed by the UN secretary general on the basis of "an equitable geographic representation," would make a comprehensive study of the confidence-building measures. This document also pointed out that all the states should arrange for particular measures to strengthen confidence by taking the conditions and requirements peculiar to each geographic region into consideration. The study recommended in this resolution is to be presented at the current session of the UN General Assembly.

Confidence-building measures can be taken to mean those political acts or actions whereby a state or group of states, voluntarily or through a legal obligation bilaterally and (or) multilaterally or unilaterally assumed, demonstrates that its military, economic, political and other activities are not directed against other states but are intended to help build confidence and strengthen peace and international security.

The confidence-building measures are an integral part of the states' general efforts to strengthen peace and international security, since they are expected to help in allaying distrust and fear in international relations, in promoting opportunities for developing an extensive dialogue and for cooperation, in reducing the risks of starting armed conflicts because of misunderstandings or misinterpretations of the states' actions, in eliminating the sources of tension and conflict, and in creating favorable conditions for progress in disarmament. Moreover experience fully proves that the measures and actions taken by various states to check the armaments race, to intensify political, economic and cultural-scientific collaboration without barriers and discriminatory practices on the principles and standards of contemporary international law, and to settle the various existing disputes by peaceful means have a significant effectiveness in establishing confidence and in maintaining peace and international security.

The constant escalation of the armaments race and especially that of nuclear armaments is one of the main factors for distrust and instability in international relations today, it causes and maintains states of conflict in various areas of the world, and it jeopardizes the peace and security of all mankind. An extremely harmful phenomenon that keeps stimulating the growth of the states' military arsenals, the armaments race is also the material base of the policy of force and dictation, of partition and consolidation of spheres of influence, and of interference in other states' internal affairs. Against the background of constantly increasing armaments, the political climate in various areas is seriously affected by the military activities of some states or groups of states. The course of events demonstrates that the increased number of maneuvers and military exercises organized with large numbers of soldiers equipped with the most modern weapons in areas with many sensitive points creates strong feelings of apprehension, fear and suspicion among the states and peoples and ultimately results in further increases in armaments on the part of those who feel themselves threatened by such military actions. Because of the states of discord and the atmosphere of suspicion and distrust that it maintains in the world, the armaments race erodes the foundations of detente and seriously interferes with developing relations of international collaboration and basing those relations effectively upon the principles of international equity and justice.

The climate of confidence and collaboration among states is also undermined by many other factors. Distrust among states is intensively fostered in our times by the underdevelopment from which a large part of humanity still suffers, injustices in international economic relations, disregard of the new principles for relations among states, absence of political dialogue, etc. Furthermore some states have inherited a number of territorial litigations and disputes from prolonged imperialist and colonial rule. And new disagreements have been caused by differing opinions and interests in connection with the approach to problems of domestic or international evolution, by the contradictions among various states and groups of states that have been aggravated by the world economic crisis, and by the intensified effort to redivide and consolidate the spheres of influence. Therefore the confidence-building must be determined in the light of the nature of the problems, the factors causing distrust among states, and the particular situation that obtains in a given region as well as in the world arena.

Depending on the contemporary international situation, the confidence-building measures may be general or specific, temporary or permanent, and unilateral, bilateral or multilateral, and they may be of a military, political, economic, legal or other nature. Regional efforts to prepare and apply these measures are to be specially emphasized. Of course it would be a mistake to "transplant" this kind of measures automatically to other regions. To be sure European experience in this field has already proved its usefulness, and it could serve as a source of inspiration for other areas of the world as well. But it is essential for measures of European origin to be adopted in the light of the particular requirements in the respective area and especially of the interests of the respective states and their wish to take such measures.

The extent to which confidence-building measures help to check the armaments race and to create a favorable climate for adopting specific measures for disarmament, and especially for nuclear disarmament, is decisive in promoting any effective confidence-building measures. Clearly such measures can never replace practical, specific disarmament measures or offer any real, viable alternative to actual and authentic disarmament. What is more, sole concentration on the role of those measures and approaching and applying them as ends in themselves may distract attention from the disarmament efforts and divert them to side issues, depriving the disarmament strategy itself of effectiveness and perspective. Despite the major contribution they can make to detente and greater confidence, such measures alone cannot accomplish the ultimate purpose of creating a world without arms and without wars. In the last analysis only practical, effective actions and measures for stopping the armaments race and for military disengagement and disarmament can contribute most effectively to creation of a climate of strong and lasting confidence favoring resumption and continuation of of detente and international collaboration.

Accordingly there is a close, dialectical tie between confidence-building measures and those for military disengagement and disarmament, and both are interdependent. This situation makes it necessary for the confidence-building measures to conform to an overall strategy that will ultimately lead to general and complete disarmament, the vital aim of the whole international community. Naturally a narrow view of the confidence-building measures could be harmful because it would limit the ways of disarming and, in general, the possibilities of determining the factors that could help effectively in establishing a climate of peace, detente, and international good will and security in all quarters of the globe.

As an integral part of the general disarmament effort, the process of determining and applying confidence-building measures must be guided by clear and well-defined principles in full accord with the requirements and distinctive nature of this kind of measures. Confidence building cannot logically be separated from the states' general behavior. Therefore the whole process of preparing and applying these measures must be governed by the principles included in the UN Charter, by other unanimously accepted standards of international law, and by the principles entered in the Final Act approved by the First Special Session of the UN General Assembly on Disarmament (1978).

Clearly commission by a state of acts incompatible with all these principles and norms as well as promotion of the policy of force, domination and interference in other states' internal affairs and of redivision of the world into spheres of influence are reprehensible acts that undermine detente and the peace and security of all peoples. On the other hand, only strict observance of the principles of justice and international legality can actually strengthen confidence among states and contribute effectively to development and diversification of international relations or to preservation and consolidation of peace. The course of events is making it increasingly clear that confidence, peace and international security essentially depend upon all states' consistent observance of the principles of national sovereignty and independence, equality of rights and mutual benefit, noninterference in internal affairs, abstention from force and the threat of force, and every people's right to free and unrestricted self-determination.

Alongside these general principles applicable to all disarmament measures, perhaps some particular requirements or rules of conduct should be set for confidence-building measures. For example, the initiative in adopting these measures must be taken by the states in the respective area (Of course such an initiative may also come from the United Nations or a regional organization). But fully equal participation of all states in an area in preparation of confidence-building measures is essential to provide for, while participation of other states with security interests in the respective area should be decided by the states in the region.

In the present-day world undergoing extensive and radical changes and revolutionary reforms under the impact of all peoples' will to live in freedom and independence, it is inconceivable for any states or groups of states, whatever their military or economic power, to impose their views in the process of adopting and applying confidence-building measures. The view of some experts and representatives of some states that those measures are to be approached in connection with the relations among the great powers, between East and West, or between the political-military alliances is incompatible with the real interests of the peoples' peace and security. A climate of confidence, good will and collaboration does not require an "elitist" or "bloc-to-bloc" participation but the active involvement of all states on the principle of full equality of rights. In the last analysis the effectiveness and influence of confidence-building measures depend upon how far they are the common work of, and comprise the efforts and interests of, all the states and peoples regardless of their social system, size or economic and military capacity.

Other requirements would also have to be considered in adopting the confidence-building measures, such as the right of the states in the same region to determine the type and character of those measures; guaranteeing all states in the respective region equal security by establishing a military balance at lower and lower levels; observance by states in other areas of the measures agreed upon by the states or groups of states in a given region, requiring that the measures agreed upon in one area do not conflict with the peace and security interests of the states in other areas; the process of determining and implementing the confidence-building measures should be an integral part of the states' general efforts toward general and complete disarmament, etc.

Constant observance of each of these requirements and all of them together may be the real and lasting guarantee of a climate of confidence, good neighbors, peace and international security.

On the basis of the Romanian people's interests and the responsibility for the fate of the peace and security of all European peoples and mankind as a whole, Romania made a sustained effort at the Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe and made a significant contribution to the preparation of the confidence-building measures and the other provisions of the Final Act.

Romania regards the confidence-building measures as part of a strategy for the ultimate purpose of general disarmament, and especially nuclear disarmament, considering that kind of measures as a first step that absolutely must be supported and especially reinforced by real measures for military disengagement and disarmament. At the 12th RCP Congress Nicolae Ceausescu referred to the fact that disarmament is a complex and lengthy process and pointed out that "It would be particularly important to start some partial measures such as elimination of the foreign military bases, withdrawal of all troops and armaments within the national borders, gradual reduction of national armies, and dismantling of the military blocs. Such measures would strengthen confidence among states and permit transition to general and total disarmament."

As a European state Romania feels the confidence-building measures in the documents approved in Helsinki should be expanded and intensified so that their implementation will result in more confidence and stability on the continent and favor transition to firm measures for military disengagement and disarmament. Meanwhile the Romanian considers it necessary to broaden and improve the concept of these measures in the light not only of the military factor but also of other problems (economic, political, social etc.) whose favorable solution would help to develop relations of confidence and collaboration among all states on the continent.

To be sure the measures accepted in the Finnish capital in 1975 were the European states' first experience in this field, and though their application has not produced the expected results they were nevertheless a foreward step in the efforts to build security and cooperation in Europe. The serious situation still existing on our continent, aggravated even further by NATO's plans to install new nuclear rockets on the territories of some western countries and the American administration's decision to produce and stockpile the neutron bomb and to increase military expenditures, demands the immediate adoption of confidence-building measures of a more binding nature as well as effective measures for military disengagement and disarmament.

Romania presented its ideas on this subject in the reply to the UN secretary general concerning Romania's experience and proposals in connection with the confidence-building measures (UN Document a/34/416, pp 38-42).

That document points out that these measures can be adopted on both the regional and international levels. The confidence-building measures that Romania envisages on a worldwide scale may include starting negotiations to conclude and ratify an international treaty to renounce use of force in relations among states; concluding agreements whereby the states with nuclear weapons pledge that they will not resort in any way, pretext or circumstance to use or threat of use of nuclear weapons against the states without them and that they will abstain from producing, procuring or installing nuclear weapons on their territories; concluding an international agreement whereby the states assume the obligation to settle any difference or dispute solely by peaceful means; and freezing the military budgets and later gradually reducing them.

On the regional level, including the European one, Romania recommends a series of confidence-building measures including: freezing the expenditures, numbers of troops and armaments in order to gradually reduce them; commitment of the states to refrain from stationing new troops and armaments on the territories of other states, to reduce gradually and withdraw all foreign troops within national borders, and to dismantle the military bases and especially the nuclear bases on the territories of other states; determination by two military alliances of a zone wherein foreign troops and armaments will not be stationed, military maneuvers or shows of force will not be organized, and there will be only limited numbers of troops, belonging to the countries on whose territories the respective zone is determined; continuing reduction of the activities of military blocs, commitment of the member states not to admit new members, and creation of conditions for simultaneous elimination of the blocs; guarantees by the nuclear states that they will not use such weapons against states without them that have assumed the obligation not to produce or procure them; reduction and cessation of military maneuvers and, in general, any show of force near the national borders of other countries; notice of troop movementsas well as sea and air maneuvers; demarcation in various parts of Europe of zones free of nuclear weapons and zones of good will and peaceful cooperation; and conclusion of a general European treaty requiring all states signatory to the Final Act to renounce the use or threat of force and not to be the first to use nuclear or conventional weapons against other states.

The proposals and suggestions the Romanian government submitted to the UN secretary general concerning the confidence-building measures are very binding and are based on the necessity of determining measures whose application can establish a lasting climate of confidence among states, detente, peace and security for all peoples.

Romania is keenly interested in the establishment of an atmosphere of, confidence, widespread collaboration, security and peace In Europe allowing the peoples to concentrate their forces and creative capacities on their socioeconomic development and to collaborate with the other nations of the world on progress, prosperity and civilization. Accordingly Romania very firmly advocated real measures for military disengagement and disarmament at the general European meeting in Madrid as a first requirement for building security and cooperation on our continent.

In connection with implementing such measures, it would be vitally important to agree that the balance of military power is not to be secured by new quotas of armaments but by increasing reductions of the military arsenals. Of course disarmament cannot be accomplished by any one country nor, in any case, by the small and medium countries first. It must be begun by the big, heavily armed countries with nuclear weapons.

The problems of military disengagement and disarmament should be the subject of a general European conference on strengthening confidence and disarmament as an integral part of the process begun in Helsinki, since the Final Act is a single and indivisible document from which no part or subject can be detached. The conference cannot be regarded as an end in itself but as a framework for mobilizing the political will of the participating states that committed themselves in the Helsinki documents to adopt effective measures of a scope and nature to constitute steps toward the ultimate goal of general and total disarmament under a strict and effective international control.

Romania made specific proposals at the Madrid meeting concerning the confidence-building measures, recommending expansion and intensification of the actions specified in the Final Act. Confirming its constant interest in reducing the risk of military confrontation on the continent, Romanian made the following proposals in addition to the measures in the documents approved in Helsinki: cessation of multinational maneuvers near other states' borders, in order to help eliminate any source of unrest and to reduce the risk of armed conflict; cessation of increased military budgets pending an agreement to reduce them; cessation of installation of new military bases, and especially nuclear weapons, and disposition of new troops on the territories of other states in Europe; notice of extensive troop movements on the territories of European states (Notice will include information on the purpose of the movement, the category of the armed forces involved, numbers of troops, armaments and combat equipment, area of disposition, route of the movement and the transport means, the period of implementing the movement, and any other useful information); notice of air and ship maneuvers, separate or combined, performed in Europe and in the maritime area or in the airspace pertaining to Europe (Notice will include information similar to that specified in the Final Act for advance notice of extensive military maneuvers). Of course these proposals of Romania's as well as those of other states at the Madrid meeting are to be discussed at the Conference on Strengthening Confidence and Disarmament.

Achievement of security in Europe and the transformation of our continent into a zone of peace, good will and cooperation among peoples are vital aims of socialist Romania's foreign policy. For our party and state and the entire Romanian people , security, cooperation, detente and peace are no abstract ideas but indispensable conditions for Romania's all-around progress. Therefore Romania and its president Nicolae Ceausescu are taking very firm action to develop internatioal collaboration and to bring about general disarmament and especially nuclear disarmament. To this end Romania firmly advocates stopping installation of new medium-range nuclear rockets in Europe and beginning the elimination and destruction of the existing ones, as well as stopping neutron bomb production, and opposes its location on the European continent. In this spirit Romania acted in Madrid and will continue to militate for implementation of all the decisions accepted by the states attending the Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe, so that along with all the European peoples it will also make an active contribution in the future to preservation and enrichment of the legacy of the civilization created by the nations of Europe and all mankind and to defense and consolidation of peace on our continent and in the world.

AU171058 Bucharest AGERPRES in English 0955 GMT 17 Dec 81

["Weekly LUMEA on Measures for Normalization of Situation in Poland"--AGERPRES headline]

[Text] Bucharest, 17 Dec (AGERPRES)--In an article presenting the measures taken in Poland for bringing the situation back to normal and the establishment of order and discipline, the Romanian foreign policy weekly LUMEA writes among other things on 17 December:

On assessing the situation in Poland, the RCP and Romanian State repeatedly presented their position, clearly stressing that they do not wish to interfere in that country's affairs, that the grave and complex problems there can and must be solved by the Polish people themselves. In this sense, as sincere friends and allies to the Polish people, in the spirit of the traditional relations of friendship and solidarity between our parties, peoples and countries, the working class in Romania, the entire Romanian people express their hope that the recently taken measures will contribute to instating a climate of order, quiet and creative work, for the normalization of the situation, that should allow for the settlement by the Polish party and state, by the Polish people themselves, of the problems and difficulties encountered by the country.

The Romanian people are convinced that the Polish working people themselves, by rallying their energies, forces, working in the spirit of loftiest responsibility for the homeland's destinies, for the supreme interests of the nation can further successfully the grand work begun three-and-a half decades ago--the work of building a strong socialist Poland, holding her due place in the ranks of the socialist states, of all nations of the world. By strengthening the active participation of the (workers) class, of the people in governing the society, in defending and developing the socialist property, in developing the productive forces and improving the societal organization, the new social relations, under the leadership of the Polish United Workers' Party, the unity of the whole people will stronger and stronger, the advanced social forces to Poland will triumph, the country's economic strength will grow, and its national independence and sovereignty will be strengthened.

HEALTH OFFICIAL URGES WISE USE OF HOSPITAL FACILITIES

Bucharest MUNCITORUL SANITAR in Romanian 10 Oct 81 pp 1, 6

/Article by Dr Radu Ozun, director of the Directorate of Medical Care in the Ministry of Health: "Let Us Increase the Responsibility for the Aid in Hospitals"/

/Text/ The health units meant for outpatient medical aid are composed of 5,400 medical dispensaries (territorial, school and enterprise) and over 400 polyclinic dispensaries. At the same time, a large number of modern hospitals commissioned in the years of socialist construction, and especially in the last decade, are in operation. The approximately 210,000 beds for medical care existing in these institutions provide a service of nearly 10 beds per 1,000 inhabitants, with our country being, from this viewpoint, among the countries with good coverage of the material base for hospitalization. The medical aid is provided free to the whole population, and it goes without saying that the advantages are unlimited for all citizens of the country.

Therefore, we have everything that we need for handling the necessary cases in the hospital. But whom do we admit?

According to the regulations in force, treatment in the hospital is provided mainly for communicable diseases, for medical, surgical and obstetrical emergencies or for chronic illnesses that require treatments or examinations only under hospital conditions. The admissions to the county hospitals, the university clinics or other specialized health units that have complex and special conditions for treatment must be done discriminatingly and only for the cases that require this.

The wide possibilities that specialized and general-medicine outpatient medical aid offers require greater exactingness, in such a way that the recommendation of admission may be preceded by exploration and as exact knowledge as possible of the case, by evaluation of the outpatient treatments applied and by full responsibility regarding the later progress of the patient.

It should be mentioned that these rules are applied properly in the majority of the specialized departments. The decisions on admission are made by specialists who, in their activity, collaborate continually with the general practitioners in the territorial or enterprise dispensaries. The patients receive medical care both through the units that provide medical aid at the workplace and through the residential health units, with the medical care and supervision of the patient being done by a dispensary, a polyclinic dispensary and a hospital, with the principle of territorialization being the basis. In the cases when the hospital to which the patient belongs does not have conditions provided or competence for giving the necessary medical care, the specialized physicians, on the basis of the responsibilities and duties that they have, must refer the patients to other specialized health units that--through their equipment and staff--have the possibility of providing the treatments necessitated by the condition of the person in question.

Although, through the provisions of the law, these rights are given to each citizen and, in the large majority of cases, they are fully respected in all the health units, from letters and audiences and from findings in the field it follows that some of these regulations are not known or are not properly applied.

This is why we have the obligation to bring into discussion the situations of the many citizens who appeal to the Ministry of Health for the resolution of situations that normally should be resolved by the territorial health units, the hospitals and the county health directorates. Most of the complaints and notifications refer to the difficulties that some citizens encounter in the granting of medical aid at the workplace or the residence. There are also some deficiencies in the population's accessibility to the specialized officies and sections, in the providing of high-quality medical services. Much of the dissatisfaction mentioned is based on irregularities in the health units, which do not apply precisely the standards set with regard to the circuit of the patient, and especially the prompt granting of specialized consultations, admission to the hospital, and referral--when the situations require it--to the competent units.

This year, a large number of letters or persons in audiences have come to the Ministry of Health for various problems, especially health problems. Many of them, referred correctly for medical aid to hospitals, institutes or medical centers, nevertheless encountered difficulties, being "directed" to obtain "approvals" at the Ministry of Health. Such situations—if this is to be "divulged"--are found in some hospitals in the capital and in many county centers, there appearing, in these cases, a lack of concern and, in the final analysis, a denial of medical aid. It is a question of those who come with a referral slip and for whom there exists the obligation of all the health personnel, through the effect of the law, to give them medical aid, that is, for them to be consulted and, if necessary, admitted. Such states of affairs in the granting of consultations and analyses, the scheduling of admissions or the performance of treatments are more frequent in the counties of Prahova, Brasov, Galati, Ialomita, Giurgiu, Teleorman, Mehedinti, Braila, Buzau and so on.

There are also situations when, disregarding the real possibilities of territorial hospitals or overestimating their professional ability, some physicians postpone, in a manner forbidden at the very least, the prompt referral of the special cases to the county hospitals or other specialized hospitals (clinics, medical centers, institutes). This is why, with good reason, these patients appeal to the Ministry of Health to solve, naturally, their health problems. There have also been some cases when patients with a haggard general condition, feverish or with a pronounced functional disability have come to the Ministry of Health for admission, this being because they did not find the necessary concern in the respective area. These situations--few, it is true--show not only the lack of understanding on the part of some specialists but also negligence in not taking all the legal steps for the proper functioning of the health units.

Undoubtedly, these aspects can lead to phenomena of bureaucracy in medical aid and generate dissatisfaction, delays and, eventually, absences from productive activity.

Moreover, from the opinion surveys made among the patients who appear for an audience at the Ministry of Health, one finds that the shuffling of them is due to the lack of understanding and concern and the failure of some physicians to fulfill the obligations that devolve upon them, as well as of some personnel in the management of the polyclinics and hospitals and even of some health directorates.

Of course, these situations do not characterize the good organization and the quality of the medical aid in our country. However, the indicated deficiencies must be speedily eliminated. The observance of the rules that involve the circuit of the patient and the growth of promptness and of moral and professional responsibility, regardless of position, will provide for the resolution of all cases in a high spirit of understanding and concern, a spirit that characterizes our socialist medicine. It is thus necessary for the health directorates, the managements of the hospitals and polyclinics, and all personnel who participate in the medical-aid process, to follow the regulations precisely and to given the necessary importance and attention to the proper performance of medical aid on all levels of the health network.

And yet, for example, in the capital there are many health units with very good personnel and with special skills, where the patients of the respective types also get special care. However, this situation leads to congestion with some cases that can be handled on a county level. Such units in great demand are the Fundeni Clinical Hospital, the Medical Center for Phonoaudiology and Functional Surgery at the ORL /Otorhinolaryngology Institute/, the Emergency Clinical Hospital, the Giulesti Hospital and so on. This is precisely why the judgment of those who refer the patients to health units, especially the university centers, must be present in each particular case and, at the same time, they must take steps to create conditions needed for handling these cases in accordance with, of course, the competences established.

The health directorates are asked to take all due steps so that all the dispensaries, polyclinics and hospitals may utilize to the utmost and with greater efficiency their full capacity for action to resolve the whole casuistics that enters into their professional competence. Within the framework of the continual development of outpatient aid, a greater and greater accent must be put on the expansion and qualitative growth of the services at the level of the dispensaries and the specialized offices in polyclinics. In this context, it is also necessary to correctly utilize the material base that the first-aid stations possess, in the interest of increasing the efficiency and promptness of the medical aid in the area. It is necessary to evaluate systematically the activities within the first-aid stations, the way in which they promptly handle the problem cases and the immediate referral of them to the sections with beds and, when the circumstances require it, even to specialized medical centers, institutes and clinics, with the absolutely necessary medical documents.

In the cases in which the patients require admission and--to provide promptness--the elimination of postponements and delays, there is the obligation to direct the patient to the unit with beds with a referral slip. The circuit of the patient at the level of the various echelons and stages of medical aid enters into the competence of the specialized physicians, who have the obligation to take the steps that are required in each particular case, complying with the hierarchical stages established by means of the regulations in force--with the exception of emergencies, of course.

We make the specification that when it is felt that the chronic patients must be referred to medical clinics, centers and institutes, the contact with these units regarding admission will be made in advance. The specialists in the units with beds that receive the patients for admission have the obligation to examine them as thoroughly as possible and, whenever necessary, to secure their admission. When the patient's condition does not absolutely justify hospitalization, the physicians will establish the outpatient treatment to be followed, with the obligation of giving the patient the necessary instructions. The health directorates must take steps, through the existing means, to inform the population about all the rights and obligations that it has in connection with the granting of medical aid, consultations and admissions to hospitals, such as the situations when they should call an ambulance, the conditions when the medical certificates are issued, and so on.

It should also be specified that in certain situations and in relation to the condition and requirements of the patients, it is recommended that the physician take the options into account as much as possible, especially with regard to the referral for admission to certain units in a position to handle the cases in an optimal fashion.

In all the above-mentioned situations, the approval of the Ministry of Health is not necessary, even if the health unit to which the patient is directed (with a referral slip) is located in another area of the same locality, in other localities in the county, or in another county, regardless of whether the unit that is to receive the patient is subordinate to the people's councils, the Ministry of Health or the Ministry of Transportation and Telecommunications. It is important to remember that the decision on admission belongs to the section chief, the only one who is in a position to judge the advisability of admission and to be responsible for his medical decisions. In connection with all these aspects pointed out, clear specifications have been made to all the health directorates, institutes and medical centers by means of Ministry of Health Circular No VI/C3/1,086 of 28 August of this year. It is thus necessary for these provisions to be applied precisely.

PROBLEMS OF YOUTH PRESS, ATTITUDES DISCUSSED

Belgrade BORBA in Serbo-Croatian 26 Dec 81 p 11

/Article by Seada Hodzic: "Peace and Unrest"/

/Text/ The situation regarding the youth press in Croatia has been relatively peaceful for almost a year now, in fact since the replacement of the editorial board of "Polet." There have not been any major "blunders" or excesses, which indicates to some people that the youth newspapers have finally found their place in society, that they are no longer an "incident," and that they have "become part of" the desires and efforts of both society and the younger generation. For others, who viewed the various excesses that the youth newspapers caused or unconsciously fell into in recent years favorably and even protectively, this is proof of a serious crisis in the youth press. For them, this indicates that opportunism and possibly even a fear of sanctions have crept into the editorial boards, and that they have adopted a policy of avoiding criticism and subordinated themselves to the will of youth leaderships and others. Naturally, conclusions are immediately drawn from this that the youth newspapers do not interest the younger generation, and that they have practically betrayed its desires and interests.

The Search for a "Formula"

It seems, however, that neither group is correct. The very fact that the youth newspapers have not been "stirring up a fuss" recently at least proves that they have found themsleves. We would likewise not agree that this is a sign of bureaucratization, apathy and opportunism on the part of the editorial boards, which are supposedly subjected every day to powerful pressure from the forums. It seems to us that it is more a question of an attempt to find a place for the youth press in the news system, especially news for young people, the search for a "formula" that will really make the youth newspapers into militant and responsible organs. Confirmation of this can be found in the youth organs themselves and in the numerous discussions of the role and problems of the youth press. The frequency of discussions of this topic in the youth organization, the League of Communists and the Socialist Alliance is encouraging, because of the obvious efforts to help the youth press, with which no one is satisfied, not even the members of the youth organizations.

One of these discussions was arranged a few days ago by the news commissions of the Croatian LC Municipal Conference and the Presidency of the Zagreb SSOH Municipal journalists, the present and former editors of "Polet" and "Studentski list," twenty journalists from communal and school papers and some from other public organs were invited. This was an interesting "round table," diverse not only in its composition but in its approach as well, and it was above all useful as proof that this topic must be discussed.

None of the participants disputed the fact that the Croatian youth press, which has a long and honorable tradition, made significant progress for years, and that it reached a large number of young people and became more interesting in its means of expression and its appearance. In any case, generations of journalists and editors of youth newspapers have made a great contribution to its recognition both among young people and in society in general. There have nevertheless been many reasons for criticism, as is still the case today, and many reasons for dissatisfaction with what it has offered and is offering, especially to young people.

The truth is, it is another question whether its errors have been pointed out to it in time or whether it has been left to drown in its own mistakes. The question is whether the temporary closings of individual publications, the replacement of editorial boards, and interventions by the public prosecutor have really been effective, or whether they have often come back like a boomerang. We are not even certain that it was necessary to react nervously, let us say, to the picture of the naked goalie in "Polet" with the inappropriate nickname "VIP," as an annoying "joke," without seeing the far more serious errors of a "conceptual nature" which cannot be overcome by restrictive measures, but only by consultation and discussion.

Anger Without Concern

Many people have been seriously angered, let us say, by the fact that the youth organs are stirring up a fuss by calling individuals in their leaderships bureaucrats and careerists, but few people have been concerned over the fact that for years some of them, guided by petty bourgeois logic, have fostered values that would have to be foreign to a self-managing socialist society. The disagreements have been caused by supposed radicalism, demagogic leftism and rarely has anyone been concerned over the fact that the youth newspapers are joking about the real problems of youth, about employment, let us say, about rewarding people according to their work, housing problems and about the attempts by some circles to instill a nationalist ideology among young people.

The youth organs have not even expressed a position in reaction to the increasingly more aggressive attempts by certain church circles to educate young people in a clerical-nationalist spirit. To tell the truth, there have been isolated attempts, but more often than not they have turned out ingloriously, like "Studentski list" a few years ago, when it aimed the edge of its pen crookedly and practically offended the feelings of believers, but gave the real culprits a pretext for a political demonstration.

It is incomprehensible that the language of some youth newspapers, "enriched" by swear words, can be more annoying than a phrase, but it is difficult to accept that this is a more serious problem than "fostering" the consciousness of an idle life, or suggesting to "papa's" and "mama's" sons and daughters that one can be idle without working. It is not clear to us how the derision of a "reformer" can be more irriating than the fact that the youth press has not explained the meaning and goals of the reform in education and instruction, or fought for it, but has even criticized some of the reform decisions and measures.

In short, it would be difficult for us to agree that the "incidents" and "execesses" are the key problem of the youth press, as long as it remains on the periphery of real youth and social problems. To that extent we can understand the words of Ratko Karabatkovic, a "Polet" journalist, about the disappointment experienced by many youth journalists and even their personal difficulties when they have been affected by the restrictions.

In such a situation, it is certainly too much to expect the youth organs to bear a burden that is obviously still too heavy for the SSO. At any rate, the positive examples of youth organs in several local and work organizations prove most clearly the assertion that the state of affairs in the SSO is also reflected in the youth press. As a rule, a successful "conceptual formula" is backed up by the substantive and successful work of a given youth organization. The high quality of these youth organs has originated first of all in their organic connection with the work, life and problems of the organization.

"Strong" and "Weak"

To tell the truth, even such successful newspapers are not without their problems and even annoyances, as is illustrated by the case of the Zagreb young workers' newspaper KROMOS. The "sponsors" of this newspaper cut back its funds after it dared to cross the Rubicon by "nicknaming the VIPs" in the collective after they violated a self-managing agreement on association, and "lecturing" the party organization because it was not implementing the conclusions of the meetings and conferences that had been held in order to overcome the unsatisfactory state of affairs in the collective. In fact, the causes were deeper, and KROMOS should not have expected to be able to resolve them just by caricaturing a few individuals, but caricaturing VIPs still should not be a reason for cutting back a newspaper's funds.

Even the appearance of illegal youth newspapers in some Zagreb schools is more a proof of the disagreement of young people with the attitude toward them than a confirmation of disobedience and wantonness, because the organs, the work of the students themselves, are in fact illegal for the school directors and the teachers' councils. They are not illegal for the school youth organizations, which are even offering them assistance.

Through the above-mentioned examples, the participants in the round table in Zagreb attempted to issue a warning about the fact that the social climate, no matter how much someone has urged the opposite, does not always help the youth press or even the youth, about whom the other "serious" organs, as a rule, write rarely and incompletely.

GDR CALLS FOR 'SOCIALIST FAMILY' CONCILIATION WITH ALBANIA

West German Commentary

Bonn IWE-TAGESDIENST in German No 170, 20 Nov 81 p 1

/Report from Berlin: "GDR for Closer Cooperation with Albania." A translation of the East Berlin HORIZONT article cited below follows this commentary/

/Text/ The East Berlin foreign affairs weekly HORIZONT (No 47, 1981) calls for Albania's reconciliation with the Moscow loyalists among the socialist countries. The resumption of equally and mutually beneficial cooperation between Albania and the "socialist family of nations" would, in the view of the GDR paper, "respond to the long-range interests of the Albanian people as well as to the cause of peace and socialism."

/Article by Juergen Mertens: "Albania: Forty Years of Workers Party"/

/Text/ The Eighth Congress of Albania's Party of Labor met from 1-7 November last in Tirana, the Albanian capital. This congress coincided with the 40th anniversary of the party's establishment, the inevitable result of a long and difficult struggle by the Albanian people for national and social liberation.

The Great October Socialist Revolution had exercised a notable influence on the Albanian workers movement. The struggle of the Albanian people for national indeoendence and the territorial integrity of the country received a strong impetus from the annulment of secret imperialist treaties (designed further to partition Albania) by the workers and farmers government in Soviet Russia.

The revolutionary fervor in the world generally gained strength after the victorious October Revolution in Russia. One of its elements was the Albanian revolution of June 1924, which featured antifeudalism and anti-imperialism. Once it was suppressed, the Zogu regime took power and tried by terror and force to stifle the revolutionary movement in Albania. However, reaction was unable to break the fighting spirit of Albanian patriots.

In 1929 a communist group arose in Korce, the first political organization of the Albanian working class. In the following years communist organizations sprang up in Tirana, Shkoder, Fier, Vlore, Elbasan and Gjirokaster.

In 1939 Albania was occupied by the Italian fascists. At that time the communists took the lead in the struggle against the foreign occupation force and domestic reaction. The danger threatening the country made it imperative to establish a political party able to become a national force, the advance guard of the popular liberation movement. In November 1941 delegates from communist groups met (illegally) in Tirana. They resolved to found the Communist Party of Albania. Carrying on comprehensive political work with the masses this communist party united all antifascist forces in the National Liberation Front and led it into battle for the liberation of the country and the establishment of the popular power.

In 1944, thanks to the victorious advance of the Aoviet Army on the Balkan, the popular democratic revolution prevailed. It offered the Albanian people also the opportunity to carry out profound socioeconomic changes and to build up socialism. In close cooperation with the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries Albania was able within a very short period to overcome the heavy burden of the past and develop into an agrarian-industrial state.

We all know that, in the early 1960's, the Albanian leadership abandoned the tried and tested way of cooperation with the socialist fraternal states. The latter have since made repeated overtures to the Socialist People's Republic of Albania, stating their readiness for the development of all-round cooperation with that country.

No doubt resumption of equal and mutually beneficial cooperation between the Socialist People's Republic of Albania and the socialist family of nations would respond to the long-range interests of the Albanian people as well as the cause of peace and socialism.

PARLIAMENTARY LEADER DISCUSSES PLATFORMS, POLICIES

Algiers AL-MUJAHID in Arabic 11 Dec 81 pp 18, 19

/Article by 'A. Huquqah: "Mr Stanko Todorov Holds a Conversation with AL-MUJAHID Magazine"/

/Text/ AL-MUJAHID has taken the opportunity to hold this conversation with Mr Stanko Todorov, member of the Political Bureau and chairman of the Bulgarian National Council, in which he replied to a group of questions that included important issues, during his visit to Algeria.

AL-MUJAHID: In the framework of the efforts the Group of 77 is exerting in the international context on behalf of a new international economic order, how do you view the need for coordinating the activities of the parliaments of the countries in this group in order to bring such a system about?

Answer: We realize that the colonialist imperialist system has broken down under the pressure of popular movements which have involved many independent countries that have pursued the road to independent development. However, these fledgling countries, which have become liberated from subjection to colonialism, are still subordinate and subject to the capitalist countries in the economic and social fields to varying degrees.

The initiative of this group of countries' is progressing along the road to development in the framework of the United Nations, with the objective of changing the system dominating international economic relations. It is characterized by progressivism and hostility to imperialism. We support it and the documents the United Nations has approved, in particular the statement and working program to establish a new international economic system and the covenant of nations' economic rights and obligations. These documents can help impart a democratic stamp to the system that controls international economic relations, but we must not forget that the capitalist countries are trying to crush the unity of the Group 77 and to preserve their privileged positions in spite of their apparent agreement /to these documents/.

While our country expresses its support for the notion of reorganizing international economic relations, it requests that this be done on the basis of equality and democracy. Meetings of the "north-south" type are limited in terms of contents and goals and cannot by themselves lead to comprehensive solutions to international economic problems. The Bulgarian People's Republic believes that the problems of international economic relations are of concern to every country and that these problems are not receptive to temporary or partial solutions. They must be studied in the context of the existing bodies in the United Nations.

Coordinating the activities of third world parliaments in the framework of this trend is undoubtedly essential.

AL-MUJAHID: Among the responsibilities that have been assigned to parliaments is that of defending and at the same time preserving the gains of the masses of the people who have given them their trust. What activities has the Bulgarian parliament pursued on behalf of its people, and peace loving peoples?

Answer: In socialist Bulgaria, the people represent the source of all authority and have all the authority. This power is exercised by the National Assembly and by the local people's assemblies which the people elect on the basis of the right to equal direct secret public votes.

The National Assembly, in its capacity as an expression of the will and authority of the people, uses its powers to defend and protect the gains of the workers and the fruits of their labor and struggles. Here I can mention three major points of emphasis in its activities:

First, the National Assembly is the sole legislative body. In its eight electoral periods, it has issued the laws required deeply to implant public ownership of the means of production as an economic basis for socialist society.

The law includes the individual's right to own such things as private property when that means satisfying his personal and family needs. The constitution and the laws spell out the basic rights and duties of citizens: the right to a job, to choice of occupation, to a comfortable life, to insurance, to retirement pensions and to social assistance, the right to free education and to free medical care, the freedom and sanctity of the individual, freedom of religion and conscience, and freedom of expression, the press, assembly and demonstration. These rights entail duties: citizens must carefully and fully carry out the stipulations of the constitution and the laws, offer beneficial labor for society, preserve socialist attainments and strive to expand them, and strive to support the economic, defense and political power of the nation. Here I would like to point out that our constitution requires every Bulgarian to work to preserve and support peace.

Second, the National Assembly is the supreme body regulating the orientation of social development planning. It approves the country's economic social development plans and also reports on their execution. The assembly approves the state budget.

A session will soon be held to ratify the second 5-year plan, which covers the period 1981 through 1985. We will also be meeting to approve the 1982 plan and budget. The assembly's permanent committees are now studying the drafts which the government has presented to them and are preparing them for study.

Third, the National Assembly conducts final oversight over the activities of the various bodies of the state. It listens to reports on the activities of the government and officials in the ministries and departments, and it conducts parliamentary investigations and adopts suitable measures.

I would like to point out that the National Assembly's role is constantly expanding; this is expressive of socialism's natural tendency toward deepening and expanding socialist democracy.

The people's assemblies are in the fullest sense of the word bodies with unlimited powers through which workers can guide the process of the development of the economy and health and social activity and improve housing conditions and cultural and educational activities. They truthfully perform social self-management and carry out their activity with the support of the masses and mass organizations.

Our people do not try to set themselves apart from other people. Therefore you will find that the bodies that represent them--the National People's Assembly and the people's assemblies--are exceptionally active in the field of strengthening relations of friendship and cooperation with all friendly peoples. Our parliament's permanent demand is that peace in our universe be strengthened, and this must be considered the most lofty and sacred right of all the peoples in the world.

AL-MUJAHID: Could you speak to us about the relations that exist between the Bulgarian parliament which you represent and the Algerian National People's Assembly?

Answer: The history of the relations that link the Bulgarian and Algerian peoples goes back to the years of your war of liberation. These relations developed since that time and came to acquire a new content following Algeria's declaration of independence. Contracts were made between the parliaments in our two countries 10 years ago. In 1979 we were given the honor of receiving a high delegation from the Algerian National People's Assembly under the chairmanship of its honored chairman Comrade Rabah Bitat.

During our current visit, we have been given the opportunity to conduct useful talks on numerous issues, especially the issue of expanding Bulgarian-Algerian cooperation into all vital fields, the problems of the hour in international relations, and support for cooperation between our two parliaments, which support peace and security in the world. We have exchanged information concerning the tasks that our two countries must resolve in the current stage under the leadership of our two vanguard parties, the Bulgarian Communist Party and the Algerian National Liberation Front Party. We have of course talked about organizing activity in our two parliaments and have compared our experiences in this realm. I believe that the circumstances are good for consolidating friendly relations between the Bulgarian and Algerian parliaments. I need mention only two reasons:

1. There are extensive cooperative relationships between the Bulgarian People's Republic and the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria in various areas of life and they are constantly developing. Therefore it is natural that parliaments, in their capacity as the supreme bodies of power, should follow up on and direct this cooperation.

2. In our world today the role of parliaments is constantly evolving in the direction of exerting further efforts to solve important human problems, most important of which is preserving peace in the world.

During our discussions with Comrade Bitat, we stressed to him our strong will to cooperate in the name of peace and mutual understanding among peoples, in order to repel the danger of nuclear catastrophe and achieve disarmament--in a word, for the sake of a world without war. This is the will of our peoples, and we will exert our maximum effort to make peace and cooperation triumph in our world. We will continue our joint struggle against imperialism, neocolonialism and racism and for the total liberation of South Africa from racist domination. We will struggle to establish just economic relations among nations.

AL-MUJAHID: Undoubtedly your visit to Algeria has enabled you to examine the actual state of domestic development in our country and the horizons of its progress through its national plans. Could you give us your impressions of our progress in eliminating backwardness?

Answer: The Algerian people, following their liberation from subjection to colonialism, have pursued a path of profound socioeconomic change, and the public sector occupies a prominent position in the domestic economy. Under the leadership of the National Liberation Front Party, agriculture and industry have pursued an accelerated course to raise the people's standard of living. We are pleased with the results the Algerian people have achieved in realizing the goals of the National Charter and the development plan, the 5-year development plan for 1980-84.

During our stay we have visited the Rubiya industrial truck production facilities and the agricultural equipment manufacturing complex in Tlemcen, as well as historic and cultural sites.

We have retained good memories of the Algerian workers who are insistently struggling to overcome the problems inherited from the era of colonial dominance.

Let me take the opportunity to wish the Algerian people further, more important victories in building an Algeria that is economically and culturally strong.

CANDID DISCUSSION OF CITIZENS' TRUST IN STATE ORGANS URGED

West German Commentary

Bonn IWE-TAGESDIENST in German No 163, 6 Nov 81 p 2

/Report from Berlin: "SED Admonishes State Organs." A translation of the East Berlin NEUER WEG article cited below follows this commentary/

/Text/ The SED leadership admonished state organs to develop a "style of operations relevant to daily life." This would have to include exact knowledge of that which motivates people. According to the SED functionary journal NEUER Weg (No 20, 1981), the Politburo by resolution also called for "the further improvement of government publicity work with the goal to more consistently inform citizens about economic and communal tasks and thus develop their readiness to cooperate in the accomplishment of these tasks." Every suggestion, every criticism and every proposal should be seriously examined and answered. A climate of trust is said to be the precondition for the frank and persuasive discussion of political issues.

SED Politburo Statement

East Berlin NEUER WEG in German Vol 36 No 20, 1981 (signed to press 15 Oct 81) pp 795-797

/'NW' article: "The Proven SED Policies to Be Conveyed Even More Convincingly--Central Committee Politburo Accepts SED Rostock Bezirk Management's Report"/

/Text/ On 22 September 1981 the Rostock Bezirk SED management reported to the Central Committee Politburo on the topic "experiences of political work with the masses in the appraisal and implementation of the Tenth SED Congress resolutions." A Politburo comment states that the Rostock Bezirk management has further raised the standard of politico-ideological work in the implementation of the Tenth SED Congress resolutions and is now concentrating all its efforts on the accomplishment of economic tasks. The significant economic initiatives in the socialist competition for the implementation of the Tenth SED Congress resolutions are the evident expression of the Rostock Bezirk citizens affirmation of SED policy.

In its comment the SED Central Committes Politburo points out significant basic issues which should be even more strongly emphasized by management organizations in the further implementation of the Tenth SED Congress resolutions. What are these basic issues?

Basic Issues Which Determine Content

Starting out from the decisive issue of the socialist revolution, the question of power, it will be necessary to concentrate all our efforts on the all-round consolidation of the GDR. It is therefore an important concern of political work with the masses to deepen the preception that the political power of the working class, its alliance with the other classes and strata, represent irreplaceable preconditions for our successful advance on the way to socialism-communism.

Political work with the masses responding to the demand requires all party organizations further to raise the standard of their politico-ideological work. Involved here is the necessity further to strengthen class positions, revolutionary attitudes and the greatest possible personal readiness to serve among party members and the working people, enabling them always to assume the correct political stance and act accordingly.

In this connection we recommend that the Rostock Bezirk management utilize every opportunity for improving the efficiency of ideological work in order even better to encourage the creativity, energy and activism of the masses. In the course of trustful discussions the questions of the working people must be frankly answered with the aim of involving them in active and conscious work for the all-round consolidation of the socialist fatherland.

Another basic issue arises from the demands for the implementation of the economic strategy for the 1980's adopted by the Tenth SED Congress: Further to raise productivity, master scientific-technological progress and achieve the advanced growth in economic performance needed for the pursuit of the tried and tested line of the main task in its unity of economic and social policy.

This offers a significant starting point for effective politico-ideological party work. After all, we are concerned further to deepen the working people's appreciation of economic interrelations and the operation of the economic laws of socialism. Included here is the necessity for making it perfectly clear that the steadily closer linkage of the benefits of socialism with the achievements of the scientific-technological revolution represents the main reserve for the ongoing improvement of the capacity of our socialist state. Lenin's finding that the improvement of productivity is crucial for the victory of the socialist social order continues to be at the heart of the party's politico-ideological work.

The Politburo points out that ideological work to explain the party's economic strategy must be so conducted as to turn into concrete economic results. To be carried on at the same time is the struggle for the all-round fulfillment of the 1981 plan and the additional achievement by the end of this year of 3 days output of disposable end products, largely by means of materials conserved. This leads to the task of making sure that all obligations of the working people to exceed the plan targets are met and all proposals from the plan discussion conscientiously realized. In agriculture, forestry and the food industry politico-ideological work must concentrate on even closer cooperation between animal and crop production as well as efficiency and quality.

It is an important concern of political work with the masses (where economic propaganda holds pride of place) to make the working people in industry, farming and all sectors aware that the assurance of the standard of living achieved and its gradual improvement require the greatest possible economic efficiency. This is reflected especially in a better cost-result ratio, declining consumption of raw materials, other materials and energy, the conservation of manpower and the greater utilization and refinement of raw materials.

In the socialist competition even greater attention must be devoted to the exchange of experiences, the discovery of reserves, the question of attitudes to socialist property, the evaluation of performance, work discipline, orderliness and safety. Another firm element of management are regular discussions with innovators and best workers in order constantly to encourage them to set an example.

To be purposefully used and promoted, therefore, are such tried and tested competition initiatives, tried and tested in Rostock Bezirk also, as "everyone every day with a good showing," "fewer produce more," "technology means speed," "cutting costs is the specialty of mariners," or "power, bread and peace." They are ideally suited to respond to the party policy formulated in the slogan issued after the Tenth SED Congress for the socialist competition: "The greatest possible rise in performance by increasing productivity, efficiency and quality--everything for the welfare of the people and for peace."

In the course of the 1981/1982 elections the labor union will therefore increase its authority as the school of socialism and initiator of the socialist competition, as the representative of the interests of blue and white collar workers. In accordance with the "FDJ Target Tenth Party Congress," the FDJ and Pioneer council elections will be concerned to strengthen the ideological steadfastness of our youth in every situation of the class conflict, further raise their readiness to study, work and defend the fatherland, define their socialist lifestyle and consolidate the FDJ's role as the helper and combat reserve of the party.

One basic issue particularly to be attended to in party management work arises from the present international situation. The Politburo's comment says that it is the most important task of our age to ensure and permanently stabilize peace. Here we are concerned mainly with explaining that the peace program proclaimed by the Twenty-Sixth CPSU Congress, supported by the Tenth SED Congress, represents the only alternative for maintaining peace, unmask the aggressive designs of imperialism and frustrate the further rearmament of the United States, the FRG and other NATO countries.

Clearly Reveal Contributions to Peace

In view of the exacerbation of the struggle for peace it is an indispensable element of political work with the masses persuasively to demonstrate the GDR's contribution to world peace, security and disarmament. Consequently one topic of political discussions with the working people must be Comrade Erich Honecker's official visit to Mexico and his meeting with Comrade Fidel Castro in Havana. These clearly showed once more the high esteem extended to the GDR and its representatives by all forces who sincerely strive for peace and understanding among the peoples.

Also important for political work with the masses is even greater official appreciation for each individual citizen's contribution to the support of the peace policy of the GDR and the entire socialist community. Every worker must be aware that activism and diligent labors lead to the further strengthening of socialism, and that the close and fraternal alliance with the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries represents a significant contribution to the struggle for the assurance of peace.

Imperative for the understanding of the processes now evolving in the international class conflict is the disclosure of the motive forces and causes of the dangerous confrontation policies of imperialism, the nature of its misanthropic profit and expansion policies. Based on this knowledge it will be possible to clearly reveal the criminal goals of imperialism which seeks to escape by aggression and war from the profound crisis of the system.

Political work with the masses in this meaning is directed further to develop the socialist patriotism and proletarian internationalism, strengthen the readiness and ability of the working people--especially the young generation--for defending, if necessary, the socialist fatherland and its achievements by military means against all imperialist attacks and attempts at interference. One conclusion arising is the need for the further improvement of socialist military education, the clear description of the enemy and the increase in political vigilance.

Another basic issue mentioned in the Politburo comment guides our attention to the persuasive explanation of the generally applicable laws of the socialist revolution and socialist construction. At the same time it will be necessary to illuminate its creative application to the strategy and tactics of domestic and foreign policies based on Tenth SED Congress resolutions and our party program. In this connection the resolution describes the political power of the working class in alliance with the class of cooperative farmers and other working people as the basis for the further evolution of socialist democracy. The struggle against all anticommunist and revisionist ideologies must be conducted without compromise, because such ideologies are imperialism's main tool for ideological diversion against real socialism and peace.

Even More Relevant to Daily Life

We have often found that profound trust of the citizens in the people's representatives and state organs creates a climate where political issues may be discussed frankly and persuasively. By such means it will also be possible even more comprehensively to involve the working people in the management and planning of social processes. The state organs therefore have a most responsible task in the further organization of political work with the masses. This begins with the development of a style of operations relevant to daily life and includes lasting relationships with citizens of all classes and strata as well as accurate knowledge of that which motivates people. Also involved is the need further to improve government publicity work with the aim to steadily inform the citizens about economic and communal tasks, thereby promoting their readiness to cooperate in the accomplishment of these tasks. Every suggestion, every criticism and every proposal must be seriously examined and answered.

The Politburo's 22 September 1981 resolution again underlines the fact that politico-ideological work is an indispensable element of the party's overall management work. It requires quick reactions to topical events and the ability to provide the necessary information and arguments to comrades in membership meetings and activist conferences. In future also the behavior of party, government and economic functionaries in work collectives as well as personal conversations and informal discussions in small groups with all strata of the public are to be firmly rooted in the topical operational plans for political work with the masses and prepared at the highest textual standard in accordance with the key issues.

The resolution also directs our attention to the steady perfection of tried and tested methods of work in party practice, such as verbal agitation (especially the work of agitators), the study of Marxism-Leninism, the history of the party and its resolutions in the party study year as well as the coordination of work with the masses by the party and all social organizations.

STATE ORGANS' DISTRUST OF CITIZENS' JUDGMENT CHIDED

West German Commentary

Bonn IWE-TAGESDIENST in German No 176, 2 Dec 81 p 1

/Report from Berlin: "Criticism of Groundless 'Secrecy Mongering' of GDR State Organs." A translation of the East Berlin DIE WELTBUEHNE article cited below follows this commentary/

/Text/ Hermann Kalb, chairman of the People's Chamber Committee on Citizens Petitions sharply criticized the frequently groundless "secrecy mongering" of state agencies in the GDR. Kalb told People's Chamber deputies that it was not permissible to maintain secrecy in the construction of a supermarket as if this were a military object. The committee chairman emphatically admonished local councils at all times to remember their duty to inform the public. Unjustified secrecy mongering was "flagrant disregard or distrust of adult citizens" and showed "political immaturity and lack of responsibility" on the part of those responsible.

In a conversation with the East Berlin WELTBUEHNE (No 48, 1981) Kalb noted in this context that "socialist democracy" would function better in practice if the theoretical opportunities were fully used. Many citizens failed to insist on their rights and actually resigned themselves to clearly unlawful states of affairs. It would, therefore, be imperative "to deepen the citizens knowledge of the law in order to increase their security under the law." At the same time care must be taken for all written and oral citizens petitions to be processed conscientiously and politically. This was not always the case because many functionaries wrongly felt them to be negative and merely an additional burden.

People's Chamber Deputy's Criticism

East Berlin DIE WELTBUEHNE in German Vol 76 No 48, 1 Dec 81 pp 1527-1529

/Article by Frank Schumann: "Input as Proof of Trust"/

/Text/ Not too long ago all the mayors of a region met in conference with the competent kreis council. The chief item on the agenda was to be petitions. Right at the beginning one mayor stood up and stated with obvious pride that he might as well go home because in his area not a single petition had been submitted in the period under review. The council chairman is said to have replied that he, for his part, considered this a very dubious distinction because evidently there was much to be desired with regard to political activism in the community...

Hermann Kalb related this authenticated episode. He took more than an hour to deal with it, but that was due more to its hidden explosive force than to its incomprehensibility. The framework was given by the first major meeting of the People's Chamber Committee on Citizens Petitions, constituted afresh for the eight election term. Hermann Kalb, committee chairman for many years past and member of the presidium of the CDU main executive board, took the opportunity to inform the deputies about the method of operations and the duties of the committee. That was necessary because the majority of deputies present was confronted with these duties for the first time.

Of course most of them were already familiar with the legal bases of petitions: Article 103 of our constitution, the 1975 law on petitions, the latest government declaration by the chairman of the Council of Ministers, the documents of the Tenth SED Congress, and so on. However, it is urgent for committee members to know how all this works in practice; after all, it is up to them to observe, check and provide guidance to the competent agencies for meeting their respective obligations. Working groups of the committee travel around the country 4 times per annum, but almost daily every single people's deputy is bound at his workplace, residential district and electoral district to devote special attention to these matters.

Hermann Kalb started by emphasizing (at a time when everybody was still under the impression of the incident described above) that petitions are the expression of socialist democracy. Unfortunately many responsible officials still and wrongly regard them as negative and something of a burden. Whoever thinks this way (and, unhappily, also tends to act accordingly) has failed to understand that such input represents the observance of civic responsibility, an offer by the citizen to the competent agency to be actively involved. Even if a petition is critical, it shows that the author is convinced of being able to obtain redress and aid from his state and its organs.

Mentioned in this connection were such terms as trust, confidence and the evolution of consciousness. Also discussed were unforgivable and irreparable errors committed by many agencies which process petitions in a bureaucratic and thoughtless manner. (Hermann Kalb: "Petitions are always management issues, not the processing of a particular subject.") Moreover, petitions are indispensable signals, often drawing our attention to conditions certainly deserving of criticism, which were unknown before--the inadequate information provided by some councils, to cite an example. Hermann Kalb quoted actual incidents and thereby demonstrated that the construction of a supermarket may not be shrouded in secrecy as if it were a military object. Citizens must be informed not only about what has happened but indeed even more about what is to happen--this ranges from changes in timetables, shifts and changes in the retail network to construction work in the region. The committee chairman reminded the deputies that they should constantly admonish the councils with regard to the latters informational duties. Unwarranted secrecy mongering, he said, was a flagrant sign of disregard or distrust of adult citizens and demonstrated political immaturity and lack of responsibility on the part of those responsible.

Petitions may be submitted in writing as well as orally, and it is not necessary to be at least 18 years old either. Petitions are not confined to any external juridical form, nor do they require the express declaration "petition." A prudent and committed deputy or state functionary should also follow up other suggestions

--whether in personal conversations, discussions, newspaper contributions, minutes or others--and deal with them as if they were petitions.

It was stated that more than 115,000 suggestions, proposals and petitions from citizens were received by the local state organs; more than half--and that is to be welcomed--oral applications. This is evidently due largely to the innumerable discussions and meetings before the popular elections and the Tenth SED Congress. At the same time it was assumed that it is also an indication of the clearly greater commitment of our citizens and their readiness to involve themselves in the settlement of those problems which touch upon them. This relates to the improvement of housing conditions, road traffic, energy, environmental control, and so on. On the other hand many petitions also reflect the fact that the demands and needs of individuals have grown faster than our social possibilities and potential. Though these conflicts cannot be resolved in confidential dialogues, they can at least be explained and made intelligible.

In conclusion Hermann Kalb therefore noted that it is always advantageous to answer petitions in personal conversations, because letters cannot replace personal contact with the citizens. He thereupon formulated phrases which were interesting not only for the committee members: State organs should make every effort at all times --not only during the official consulting hour on Tuesdays!--to grasp opportunities for talking to the citizens, and that includes the acceptance of petitions. Moreover, the agency which receives the petition must initiate the response. All too often it is the citizen himself who is sent on the "paperchase through the bureaucratic jungle." That is certainly not admissible. And finally a settlement of the citizen's problems must be found consonant with available economic possibilities and in accordance with the mandatory regulations. In most cases this will be possible, given good will on both side.

"Socialist democracy," Hermann Kalb told me in a subsequent conversation, "is as good as it works in practice. It is mainly up to all of us to utilize the theoretically available possibilities. Many citizens unfortunately still fail to insist on their rights. The reprehensible custom of restaurants, for example, to arrogate to themselves the right to seat customers is definitely illegal--unless exceptions were agreed with the local state organs. Yet people still line up in front of empty restaurants and, agrily or resignedly, wait to be assigned a table. It is therefore imperative to deepen the citizens knowledge of the law in order to enhance their security under the law. The state organs in our country must carefully evaluate the proposals, suggestions and criticism submitted by citizens and take into consideration every thought and intimation. We must find out whether every precaution is taken for all written and oral petitions to be processed conscientiously and with political responsibility and ensure that at all times all opportunites are used for seeking constructive solutions in order to meet the justified concerns of the citizens."

The People's Chamber Committee on Petitions met in Berlin for the first major discussion after the elections. Its duties are clearly spelled out. If the incident described at the beginning is not repeated ever agin, our thanks will be due this group of deputies and their efforts on behalf of the voters.

GDANSK VOIVODSHIP PARTY PLENUM ACTIVITIES REPORTED

Gdansk Party Plenum

Gdansk DZIENNIK BALTYCKI in Polish 15 Oct 81 pp 1, 3

[Article by JAF-NOW: "Conditions for Applying Economic Reform; Current Sociopolitical Situation; M. Chabowski and M. Stefanski, Voivodship Committee Secretaries"]

> [Text] Yesterday in the hall of the Gdansk Voivodship Office, the Plenum of the PZPR Voivodship Committee deliberated. In opening the deliberations, Tadeusz Fiszbach, first secretary of the Voivodship Committee, greeted the members of the central party authority, Jan Labecki, member of the Central Committee Political Bureau, the members of the Voivodship Committee, deputies to the Sejm, the party-management aktiv, and representatives of the districtiion administration and Jerzy Kolodziejski, the governor of Gdansk.

The main subject of the deliberations was the determination of conditions for applying reform in the Gdansk voivodship, a discussion of the current sociopolitical situation, and, in organizational matters, the election of two new Voivodship Committee secretaries. The plenum should concentrate, T. Fiszbach said in the introduction to the discussion, on an assessment of all possibilities and proposals for action aimed and rapidly and fully applying economic reforms.

Controversies appeared as early as during the fixing of the daily agenda. Before the plenum began, consultations were conducted in four rather subdistrict groups of members of the voivodship echelon. In the opinion of Voivodship Committee members from Gdansk and Sopot, the current sociopolitical situation in the voivodship should have been the main topic of discussion, which would have been useful to members of the Central Committee in the Gdansk voivodship before the plenary meeting of the Central Committee which began on Friday. Ultimately, during the discussion both these important subjects were dealt with in a lively manner.

The report by the Executive Board of the Voivodship Committee on conditions for applying economic reform, which constituted an introduction to the discussion, was delivered by the Voivodship Committee secretary, Andrzej Karnabal (an extensive summary of the report is published below).

A discussion followed which was very lively and frequently controversial. Questions from the floor were put to the speakers, and in doubtful cases, explanations and amplifications were demanded. Frequently T. Fiszbach, who conducted the deliberations had to quiet the participants in the discussion. After each expression of an opinion, the speaker was given an opportunity to reply, which meant that a participant in the discussion more carefully and responsibly formulated his ideas.

The following took part in the discussion: Wojciech Solarski, Czeslaw Skowron, Jerzy Jarosz, Ryszard Bratke, Zygmunt Ceszke, Jerzy Kostarczyk, Zdzislaw Wesolowski, Tadeusz Olszewski, Klemens Gniech, Michal Muzalewski, Zbigniew Garbacz, Andrzej Kulawik, Jerzy Bojko, Stanislaw Kolodziejek, Jerzy Kiedrowski, Stanislaw Sucharski, Jozef Kurpisz, Stanislaw Kwidzynski, Tadeusz Kuta, Jerzy Kolodziejski and Jan Labecki.

The application of economic reform, it was said, was long delayed. Some people are waiting for January 1, 1982, believing that on that date reform will automatically go into effect and everything will change immediately. But the truth is that the basic standard legal instruments that are indispensable to the functioning of a self-dependent, self-financing and self-governing enterprise are not even half completed. There are people both in the party as well as in the old power structures who would like to halt the reforms, which would deprive them of their positions and appanage. Some managers, it was said, who have not made the proper preparations for applying reform cannot remain in their positions once reform goes into effect. The opinion was expressed that the workers' self-governments will make some serious changes in the leadership cadres, but those who will be eliminated deserve no sympathy. The honest, competent people, those with initiative, irrespective of party affiliation, will be able to defend themselves.

Many participants in the discussion mentioned that preparations for reform are still in the elementary stage, that it is still in the stage where legal standards are being formed and being discussed by specialists who cannot reach agreement on many detailed points. It is time to end these theoretical considerations and begin training the management and working aktiv in the enterprises. Success will depend on its knowledge, sensitivity to the situation and commitment to reform. The role of the party aktiv in conducting reform was emphasized, regarding it as the touchstone of party credibility. At the initiative of 30 party organizations, a conference was held recently in Wiezyca which was attended by representatives of 76 enterprises of the maritime economy and seven ministers and deputy ministers. It turned out there that instruction on the subject of reform had not been completed in even one enterprise, and it had been begun in less than 40 percent of the enterprises. Unfortunately, government representatives present at the conference had little to say. Thus it is doubtful that all enterprises will be ready to operate under conditions of reform on January 1, 1982.

It was stressed that the success of reform is dependent upon social acceptance. We must all work, it was said, to make all Poles aware that reform is the only formula for overcoming the crisis. But this will not be a painless operation--we must expect to make sacrifices. Society is weary of the protracted crisis, the market difficulties, the inefficient functioning of trade and the generally deteriorating standard of living and work, and may react in an unpredictable manner.

We are already having to deal with protest actions in some voivodships that even Solidarity is not controlling. That is why, in order for reform to succeed and tensions be eased, the goals, long- and short-range, of reform must be clearly defined.

The conditions for efficient application of reform and even all of its possible dangers, were the subject of an extensive speech by governor J. Kolodziejski. Never yet has so much depended in our postwar years on reform as now. Also, he said, it is more difficult to imagine worse conditions for applying reform, than those that now exist. He said further that the deepening crisis steadily limits the field of enterprises' economic self-dependence and in three months it may be even more limited. The struggle for self-government, which is a component of reform, is, naturally, a struggle for power, but it is also clear that self-government implements democracy, which is, of course, the essence of socialism. Thus the party cannot defend itself against self-government, whether workers' or territorial. Why are we afraid of trusting the very class of workers in whose name we are exercising power, asked one speaker rhetorically. The current concept of reform does not have the full support of society. We must fight for this support, for the Sejm law settles nothing automatically. The situation is so bad, said J. Kolodziejski, that nothing further can harm us and we must conduct reform immediately. And although in the Gdansk voivodship we are not too badly prepared intellectually and organizationally, nevertheless we do not have the appropriate economic conditions. We must expect also that there will be social conflicts. Already now the potential unemployment reaches 20 percent, and in some plants considerably more. Many people go to work, it is true, but they are getting paid for doing nothing. In January, when the enterprises feel the action of the economic laws, the dismissals of these surpluses will begin. We expect that about 20,000 people will be let go, for whom we must find work, after retraining them. To solve the problem, which may grow larger, we must take into account the possibility of an emigration to work elsewhere, either individual or organized. The latter is, for example, possible in the construction firms, for some of them already have an established reputation abroad.

J. Kolodziejski expressed the opinion that the next threat to reform will be an attempt to jack up the prices by the producers, which in turn will evoke a protest by the trade unions and a demand for price-increase allowances. In order to reconcile the parochial interests of the enterprises and the entire society we must develop an effective system of negotiation. If we are not able to do this, we may face anarchy.

The second current in yesterday's discussion oscillated around the country's and voivodship's most important sociopolitical problems. The struggle about the form of the country's political system continues. For some, renewal means a deep reformation of socialism under our own, Polish, conditions. But for others it means a change in this system. A political activist, it was said, should be fully aware of what the struggle is about. Loyalty to the principals of the political system, however, does not mean severance of social agreements and the selection of a course for confrontation, as some defenders of the old order would like, wanting to hold on at any price to their present positions. In this context, demands were made to form a joint front of common sense -- the party, along with the trade unions and the church. Some speakers, who called for deliberations at the same table, pointed out that many difficult and controversial problems could be solved here, right in Gdansk. Let us not dwell on the differences in the party's and Solidarity's programs, one speaker appealed, but let us look for contiguous points in the name of a single national interest, in the name of saving the fatherland.

The political line of the PZPR daily, GLOS WYBRZEZA, raised doubts in some participants in the discussion. They accused the newspaper of departing from party principles. The question was even asked: Whose newspaper is GLOS WYBRZEZA--the party's Voivodship Committee or Solidarity's Regional Board? An exceptionally strong argument developed on the relationship of the GLOS with NSZZ Solidarity's First Congress, and on S. Kryda's article, "We Are Revolted by Such a Newspaper". The Voivodship Committee's Commission on Information and Propaganda was of another opinion and rated the activity of GLOS WYBRZEZA thus far very highly. It was stated that if a newspaper is to serve society and not be an internal organ for party members, it must reflect the attitudes and opinions of this society. The newspaper was able to fulfill these conditions.

The editor-in-chief of GLOS WYBRZEZA, Tadeusz Kuta, replying to the criticism, said that the evaluations of the newspaper made, among others, by the Central Committee's Press Section and by the Executive Board of the Voivodship Committee in Elblag were positive. Nevertheless, this conflict of opinions will require some serious considerations and a reply to the question of how much truth there is in these accusations. T. Kuta said that at the present time one of the main goals of the party newspaper is the democratic defense of the elected authorities of the PZPR Voivodship Committee.

The speech by Jan Labecki, member of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee, corresponded with this statement. Labecki, at the end of the discussion, expressed support for the line represented by GLOS WYBRZEZA. And in commenting on the so-called meeting of the Gdynia veterans, he said that the inspiration for several pronouncements that were unfavorable to the newspaper came from within. We have met with them before and their aim is to undermine the authority of the voivodship's party echelon.

Next J. Labecki discussed the current political situation preceding the approaching PZPR Central Committee Fourth Plenum. He expressed the fear that the radicalization of some circles of a determined society may revive the willingness to solve the growing conflicts by means of old methods. But we can no longer tolerate, he stressed, the already actually existing diarchy. Thus these currents must be channeled into a reformed National Unity Front, or some other such plane. This problem, to its fullest extent, will fall after elections to the territorial self-government.

Referring to economic reform, J. Labecki said that only the party will be responsible for its success politically. If reform does not succeed, this will be another blow to the party. The people should be made aware that self-government is not a miraculous cure for all ailments. It will probably produce some results, but this will take time. During the first period of functioning, the self-governments will try to shift all of the weaknesses of their plants, as well as waste in raw materials, organizational incompetence and lack of discipline, onto the shoulders of the purchasers, i.e., society. Only later, with time, will come the return to senses and the time for economic reckoning. In conclusion, the speaker stressed the fundamental economic importance to our country of Polish-Soviet relations. Yet in a part of our society we see a striving to undermine the credibility of these relations. It is in the interests of our country to firmly oppose these opinions.

On the point relating to organizational matters, the plenum approved the by-laws of the Voivodship Committee, its organs and executive apparatus and the principles of the functioning of the PZPR Voivodship Committee problem commissions in Gdansk.

The PZPR Voivodship Committee Plenum in Gdansk, in the form of a separate document, took a position on the current sociopolitical situation (the text of this document is published below).

Two additional Voivodship Committee secretaries were elected. Mieczyslaw Stefanski was elected secretary for agricultural affairs and Mieczyslaw Chabowski was entrusted with the functions of organizational secretary. The Plenum, at the motion of the Executive Board of the Voivodship Committee, appointed Miroslaw Demichowicz to the position of manager of the Social Research Center, Tadeusz Wojewodzki to manager of the Information Center, and Jerzy Jakubowski to the position of manager of the Maritime and Transport Section.

T. Fiszbach took the floor at the conclusion of the deliberations.

New PZPR Voivodship Committee Secretaries

Mieczyslaw Chabowski was born in 1947 in Lebork to a workers' family. After graduating from the Communications Technical School in Gdansk, he began work in the Paris Commune Shipyards in Gdynia as an assembler. He was active in the youth movement, holding the position of chairman of the Plant Board of the Socialist Youth Union in the shipyard. In 1972 he went to work in the City Committee in Gdynia and in 1974 he was sent for studies to the Higher School of Social Science, in the Economic and Social Department. After completion of these studies in 1977 he became second secretary of the PZPR Plant Committee in the "Commune" and, after August, 1980, he was elected first secretary of the Plant Committee. He has been awarded the Gold Cross of Merit.

Mieczyslaw Stefanski was born in 1951 to a peasant family in Mikoszow, Koscierzyna. After completing the Technical Agricultural Academy in Olsztyn, with the degree of master of engineering, he conducted the family farm for a while. He was also a temporary instructor in the party's Gmina Committee. He completed postgraduate studies and has started doctoral studies. His last position was manager of the Agricultural Circles' Cooperatives in Koscierzyna. He has shown himself to be an able organizer and an energetic party activist.

Report of Executive Party Meeting in Gdansk

Gdansk DZIENNIK BALTYCKI in Polish 15 Oct 81 p 3

[Article: "Consistent Implementation of Economic Reform -- the Only Alternative for Solving the Crisis"]

[Text] The proper conduct of reform is not only an opportunity but it is a necessity from which there is no return. It is the determinant of the existence of our state. It is also the party's big chance to authenticate its activity in all of the social processes occurring in our country. Economic regression continues, and all attempts at stemming it are failing. The decline in national income this year will be over 15 percent. The city's ties with the village are breaking down, the emigration for jobs is growing and we now have a flight from the zloty and a hyperinflation of the dollar. The rationing system has not calmed the market. Thus, we have a situation unheard of thus far in a socialist economy.

Undoubtedly, the intensity of this crisis is due to a large degree to serious political errors of past years. The scale of the current breakdown is rather proportional to the scale of the structural errors committed and the centralized apparatus for managing the economy has not reacted promptly enough to the crisis symptoms.

Today, despite the good will of the party and the government, despite the fact that we have a program for overcoming the crisis and we have the directions for economic reform, despite important changes in the leadership apparatus, it is difficult to stop the dynamic disintegration of our economy in all its elements.

This situation exists despite a number of actions implemented by the authorities. The program for economic stabilization and the directions for economic reform were unequivocally accepted by the party's Ninth Congress. Our voivodship party echelon also without hesitation proclaimed itself in favor of the far-reaching economic reform at its plenary meetings held November 10, 1980 and August 3, 1981. The position on this matter is contained also in the resolution of the Eighteenth Voivodship Reports-Elections Conference.

The lack of concrete results was due to the fact that the directive-order instruments for managing the economy, which were applied up to 1979 with supports, because it took supports and a tremendous social cost, to ensure relative effectiveness, ceased to function. Yet in their place no instruments were substituted which could have halted the declining tendencies in the first stage and, as a result, formed a basis for overcoming the present situation.

A further growth in personal incomes, with the already existing tremendous reserves and the progressive drop in national income, may soon lead to a final breakdown in the economic system.

It is our party and civic duty to realize this truth and to make everyone aware of it.

The party's historical task is based on the fact that it assumed political responsibility for finding a way to lead the country out of the crisis, the more so since it bears responsibility for the current state.

The paradox in the country's present situation, however, is the fact that the rhythm of social life shapes the political problems, and the socioeconomic justifications under this system are secondary. There are many examples of this. The best appears to be the recent discussion, having the characteristics of a political confrontation, and actions at the time of the passage of the law on an enterprise and self-government.

The Sejm passed both these laws going far beyond the limits of the government draft. It passed laws which embody the fruition of a nationwide discussion.

Opinions on the now-approved law were obtained, during the drafting phase, from the Presidium of the Solidarity National Consultative Commission and from the branch unions, and the law was acceptable to them.

The decision by Solidarity's Congress to call for a referendum on certain rules in the law on an enterprise and self-government is not only the next occasion for a confrontation with the authorities, but what is worse, it carries with it the risk of a national tragedy.

We are fully aware of the fact that the government is not in a position to implement any reform without the approval of the trade unions. Reform requires sacrifices, which Solidarity may induce society to make. But at the same time, the government cannot permit everything that happens in our country to be an unending struggle for power.

The importance of political issues in the totality of the life of the nation cannot conceal the fact that in the minds of an ever-larger number of people, everyday problems have begun to dominate. Elementary questions such as how to live, or more frequently, how to live through, must be answered concretely and credibly. The credibility of the government's measures in the socioeconomic sphere is the key to emerging from the impasse. Society could bear greater difficulties and sacrifices if it were confident, on the basis of experience, that the government is able to fulfill the obligations that it assumed in the program for stabilization and economic reform.

Thus, practically speaking, the key to reform of the economic and financial system lies in reducing society's distrust in the state's promises and efforts, at least enough so that this society can regard price increases and changes in the wages and income system as having been reasonably calculated, and that insofar as possible, the costs of solving the crisis are equally distributed and not transferred from one social group to another.

In order for this confidence to appear and materialize in constructive, and not destructive, behavior in enterprises, farms and on the market, the government and local administrative organs must pass, and very positively, a credibility test, i.e., demonstrate effectiveness by several successful endeavors, as seen by society. The process of calling persons to account for their actions has not satisfied social expectations. The decisions on rationing basic necessities were such an opportunity, but the ration cards, for the most part, were meaningless for there were insufficient supplies to fill the rations. The price increase on grain products was an opportunity to be one of these measures, but the simultaneous deterioration of the quality of baked goods deprived it of its advantage.

The opponents of socialism readily employ demagoguery in their attempts to weaken the party. But we have had too few opportunities thus far to demask this demagoguery, to refer to the actual, positive results of the actions of our state. The issue on which we are not always in agreement in the party and also in the voivodship party organization, is the degree of society's participation in the country's management through such institutions as workers' self-governments and trade unions.

There are comrades who claim that the party should not, actually cannot, limit its power in management, for this means distortion of socialism and a departure from the position of social democracy, "anarchosyndicalism", etc. Such a conception of our policy line under the present circumstances can be called "a hard line leading to nowhere".

There are comrades among us who say that under the present circumstances the party can share all of its power, not only in the individual enterprises but also in the state. Such a conception can be called "the soft line leading to nowhere".

The opinion prevails among party members that the party must jointly, with all forces based on socialism, direct the country's affairs, and that actually this occurred after August of last year, with the active participation of most party members, and that this also was recognized by the party's congress. But the problem which is difficult to solve is the concretization of decisions in the sphere of laws and the political practice of this golden mean, particularly in the economy.

This legal and political state, which could become our golden mean, in this issue is the recognition that the economic verifiers (self-financing) and the social verifiers (self-government, trade unions), are able to bear the largest part of the responsibility for the results of management, and leave the initiative, supervision and implementation of economic policy to the party and the government.

The conceptual preparations of economic reform in the economic strata and in the instrumental strata is considerably advanced and in its fundamental portion does not provoke any important controversies. Discussions around the method for solving certain elements are taking place and will continue.

The principle of self-financing the functioning of enterprises, the unequivocal desire to make prices realistic, the freeing of banks from state administration and the implementation of credit maneuverability, the independent division by the workforce of the surplus produced by the enterprise--these are only the more important instrumental solutions which can be used to rapidly create the bases for reversing unfavorable trends.

Mutual contacts of economic units will be based mostly on voluntary and contractual relationships, and the restrictions on material supplies is to be held to a minimum and as time goes on, eliminated. The state will guard the economy against monopolistic attempts.

All of this may quite rapidly lead to an improvement of economic interconnections and an effective and actual balancing of economic processes. If this is to become possible, the inflationary spiral must be halted, along with the accompanying acceleration of monetary incomes without coverage by production. For the short run, the only way out is a social agreement based on an understanding of the current situation and the importance of our intentions. It must integrate most of society around the economic reform system as a means of implementing social goals and it must halt the senseless inflationary spiral.

For a number of months, along with the discussion on directions of reform, preparations for applying this reform have been going on in many institutions in our land.

A doubt is also forming on whether the leadership cadre, brought up in our system, is able to adapt itself to the new requirements. Will it be able to "self-reform".

It is useless to consider this problem apart from the mechanism of cadre policy that results from laws on an enterprise and self-government. Certainly from the general assumptions of reform as well as from the laws it is evident that the self-government mechanism will be the main mechanism of verifying cadre. The appointment of directors will be additionally strengthened through the procedure of competitions.

Under these circumstances, it is in the vital interest of the party, its main task in the sphere of cadre policy, to improve the self-government mechanism in this field. The concentration should be on the selection of the proper criteria, so that the competition commissions can be guided by criteria of skills. We cannot defend persons in positions simply on the basis of a principle of defense, or because of past services. We must make our selections using objectively recognized criteria.

The far-reaching socialization of the process of applying reform will require that the state and economic administration suitably organize this process.

Various nonstereotypical initiatives, going beyond the current system of management functioning, are being undertaken. An example of this is the recently formed by several enterprises, union of enterprises, the first in Poland, which has called itself an Industrial Council. Other attempts of this type are taking place. Attempts to find different forms of cooperation and mutual assistance, that is, attempts to consolidate and create new economic ties. Without a doubt these are initiatives that are in accord with the spirit of reform. Furthermore, they surpass it without the traditional looking to see whether or not the appropriate regulations already exist.

As a party acting on the basis of a Ninth Congress resolution, we should give this our political support. We must undertake firm counteraction, particularly in cases where some social group attempts to sabotage reform, whether in the name of narrow interests or for doctrinaire reasons.

We thus see the main task before our plenum to be the granting of firm support to those social elements which participate in the work of reforming our economy. We should also attempt to point out specific undertakings. It appears that the most important undertaking in the immediate future is the elimination of organizational structures that make it difficult to apply reform.

The state and economic administration, in undertaking successive actions connected with the application of reform, must at the same time take the indispensable steps to safeguard social interestes. We should concentrate especially on the problem of the dislocation of workers. While being guided by the economic interests of the enterprises on the one hand, we should search for a new level of reasonable employment, and on the other hand, being guided mainly by the social interest, we should efficiently and rapidly employ the surpluses of working forces that arise.

In this sphere the close cooperation of enterprises with local organs is indispensable. Indispensable also is the cooperation of all political and social organizations for the good of the workers and society.

The assessment contained in the report authorizes the Executive Board to present to the Voivodship Committee a number of actions which we should immediately begin to implement.

On the assumption that the party's main task now is to convince society as to the correctness of applying this reform, we regard the following to be most important:

1. Immediate informational-propaganda activities showing society and the working class the necessity of conducting reform, the conditions for applying this reform, and obtaining through this the most universal agreement possible for a temporary halt in the growth of the standard of living, and even in its reduction, which is an unavoidable consequence of putting reform into effect.

2. Bringing the members of the party and all members of the workforces closer to the most important elements of reform and explaining how they function.

3. The party's political responsibility for the application and success of reform places on all its echelons and elements an obligation to prevent any conflicts that may arise from this.

4. The active cooperation of the Plant Committees and the Primary Party Organizations with plant commissions for economic reform and the dissemination among party members of the results of the work of these commissions.

5. With the assistance of instructors from the Plant Committees, City Committees, the Voivodship Committees and the Central Committees and the skills of the economic activists, the entire basic party aktiv of the enterprises should be retrained in the field of reform as quickly as possible, i.e., by the end of this year.

6. The plant party organizations should stimulate the administrations to take all possible technical and organizational measures to put reform into effect at the beginning of 1982 in a manner as gentle and as understandable to the workforces as possible.

7. The establishment of broad and multifaceted cooperation between the plant party organizations and the trade unions and other sociopolitical organizations in behalf of understanding and obtaining social acceptance for reform and the principles of its application.

8. An indispensable element for the application of reform is an increase in the efficiency of activities of all local administration elements. In view of the anticipated and postulated decentralization of administrative authority and the increase in the competence of the lowest levels of territorial self-government, it is essential that cadre and organizational changes be made in the administration offices at all levels.

9. It is the task of the Voivodship Office to develop the concept and conditions for applying reform in such important spheres of social life as: the municipal economy, trade and the food economy complex. The development of this concept should be accompanied by widespread consultation so that the solutions applied as a result would serve the people and not the institutions appointed for the implementation of this concept.

Gdansk Party Position on Socioeconomic Situation

Gdansk DZIENNIK BALTYCKI in Polish 15 Oct 81 p 3

[Text] Almost three months have elapsed since the Ninth Extraordinary PZPR Congress, yet the goals which it placed before the party have not been implemented to a satisfactory degree. This arouses a justifiable dissatisfaction in society and an ever-greater concern in party members.

The country's economic and political situation is developing in a dangerous direction. We are dealing with a progressive drop in production and national income, with the disintegration of the domestic market, and a deteriorating standard of living.

The course of the Solidary Congress, during which dangerous political trends became apparent, fills the broad ranks of society with a justifiable worry about today and tomorrow. However, people are looking with approval and hope to those forces of Solidarity which see the way to expand their union with restraint and judgment.

1. The Voivodship Committee states that everything that threatens the line of understanding is in conflict with the most vital interests of the nation, with Poland's reason of state.

The formula for national understanding was so expanded during the past year that we can now speak not just about the idea but also about the doctrine of a national understanding.

The idea of understanding is not abstract. It refers to a clearly defined place and time, to Poland's specific situation in 1981. It is addressed to all socio-political organizations who are in favor of socialism.

2. We are and will remain a party whose weapon in the struggle for socialism is the force of argument and not the argument of force, which struggles for the collective interest of the working people. That is why the Voivodship Committee believes that it is indispensable and urgent to rebuild on new foundations a front of patriotic understanding, open to all who are not against socialism, for all who are concerned about Poland. This front of national understanding, a front for the cooperation of all forces--political, social and trade union--is needed so that we can regain our ability and strength to conduct reform and to lift the economy so that it will be able to restore normal living conditions to society.

3. The circumstances in which our country and nation has found itself is dramatic. The Voivodship Committee concurs with the position of the Political Bureau, seeing in it a concrete offer of the front of social understanding and cooperation of all forces and groups in solving the crisis.

4. The PZPR Voivodship Committee believes that the crisis can be effectively overcome only in a atmosphere of public order, an atmosphere of social peace, with the mobilization and initiative of all working people directed toward honest work, with the simultaneous strengthening of all alliances with the Soviet Union and with all countries in the socialist community.

We are convinced that socialist renewal will also mean a strengthening of these alliances.

The PZPR Voivodship Committee in Gdansk entrusts the further successful deepening of economic cooperation and trade relations with the Soviet union to the special care of the party organizations, economic administration and workforces of the industrial plants.

5. The Voivodship Committee believes that the initiatives of the workplants on the Gdansk Coast, expressed in the appeal to all patriotic forces, to be particularly valuable and regards the text contained therein worthy of wide support.

6. In continuing with the building of social understanding, begun in August 1980 with the allied political factions and social and youth organizations, the Voivodship Committee believes that it is useful to begin talks with the Solidarity Regional Board in Gdansk and the branch and autonomous unions functioning in our area, in order to develop some measures and actions aimed at jointly overcoming the crisis and lessening the troubles of everyday life of the people in the Gdansk voivodship.

7. The Voivodship Committee believes the following to be particularly important in the cooperation of the party organizations with the trade unions:

-- activating the functioning of the self-governments in accordance with the Sejm decisions as rapidly as possible,

-- guaranteeing a sense of certainty of the actions of the leadership cadre,

-- improving the market situation,

-- applying economic reform.

8. The Voivodship Committee states that it is the duty of all party members to assist the state, local and economic administration in its efforts to alleviate the effects of the crisis.

The Voivodship Committee calls upon all party members in the Gdansk voivodship to support its efforts, the efforts of the echelon and the party aktiv, aimed at uniting in order to regain the ability and strength to conduct socialist reform and lift the economy so that it can ensure normal living conditions and development to society.

Gdansk Party Resolution on Economic Reform

Gdansk GLOS WYBRZEZA in Polish 26 Oct 81 p 3

[Text] In accordance with the authority of the Executive Board, the PZPR Voivodship Committee in Gdansk accepted the wording of the resolution of the Voivodship Committee, passed at the plenary meeting on October 14, 1981.

The document is composed of four parts.

In part one the Voivodship Committee affirms the acceptance of the assessment of the sociopolitical situation in the Gdansk voivodship presented by the Voivodship Committee's Executive Board. This assessment became the basis of the position taken by the Voivodship Committee on this matter. The text of this declaration was published in GLOS WYBRZEZA on the 15th of this month.

Part two of the resolution pertains to the basic point of the deliberations at the plenum of the Voivodship Committee--the conditions for applying economic reform.

/"The Voivodship Committee states, the resolution reads, that the urgent application of economic reform is the real and only change for creating the economic mechanisms which will guarantee the implemention of the assumptions of the political system in our country's economy, and thus restore authority and social recognition to the party's leadership role. The essential precondition for bringing the country out of the crisis is social peace and the conclusion of an anti-crisis agreement between the government and the trade unions.

To ensure that the economy will function properly under economic reform and to safeguard the implementation of overall-social goals, the planning system must be socialized and the functioning of local self-governments (voivodship and gmina [parish]) must be activated, in accordance with the directions of economic reform accepted at the Ninth Extraordinary Congress.

At the same time, the Voivodship Committee sees the dangers which may cause a delay or which may cause the full application of reform to be impossible to accomplish. These dangers include:

-- lack of approval for the actions and intentions of the authorities caused by low effectiveness of past decisions and the propaganda of negating all actions on the part of the extreme forces of Solidarity,

-- the continually deteriorating economic situation and lack of political stabilization, which carries with it a risk of an explosion of protest by society and national catastrophy,

-- lack of basic legal instruments, and often even drafts of these instruments, which are necessary before the enterprises can prepare to apply reforms. One of the conditions for the success of reform is that it have full social acceptance,

-- weak preparation and a waiting stance of a large part of the leadership cadre in the economy and the administration at all levels of management,

-- lack of basic knowledge on the conditions for the functioning of enterprises under economic reform and the social costs resulting from its application.

The Voivodship Committee believes that without honest information and knowledge about reform it will be impossible to obtain the full commitment of the party aktiv and all party members and their active participation in the formation and proper functioning of workers' self-governments.

The Voivodship Committee supports all party, social and occupational initiatives aimed at making it possible to fully apply reforms. An example of this type of activity is the conference, held on October 9th and 10th, 1981, of the sociopolitical and economic aktiv of enterprises of the maritime economy and the shipbuilding industry in Poland's northern voivodships. It is the task of the voivodship echelon to give political and organizational support so that the results of this conference can be fully utilized. Other examples are: verifying the leadership cadre jointly with the workers' councils and having the Voivodship Committee problem commissions cooperate with the Voivodship People's Councils and the City People's Councils."/ [in boldface].

The resolution states that the Voivodship Committee has recognized the motions contained in the Voivodship Committee Executive Board's and Gdansk governor's report to be an integral part of this document and obliges all of the addressees of these motions to implement them. The motions are contained in an attachment to the resolution. There are 15 of them and most of them pertain to the popularization of the assumptions of economic reform and the training of cadre involved in implementation of reform, with the participation of all interested organizations and institutions. They also bind the party echelons and organizations to actively function so as to implement economic reform and form workers' self-governments.

Attention is also called to the prevention of social conflicts which may arise as a result. It is said in the motions that the voivodship administration organs must immediately prepare and submit a forecast of the social consequences of economic reform, taking problems of employment, prices, incomes, etc., into consideration. They must also submit specific proposals for alleviating negative side effects. The motions also state the need to propose to the central authorities that they accelerate the preparation and issuance of the standards acts which are lacking for the introduction of reform, and also urgent preparation of the party concept of territorial self-government.

In part 3 the Voivodship Committee's resolution approves the rules and regulations for the work of the Voivodship Committee and its problem commissions and also the structure of the organs and executive departments of the Voivodship Committe, which was contained in the report of the plenum.

Part 4 of the resolution contains the five following general motions:

/"1. The Voivodship Committee authorizes all political workers to appear in its name and conduct party work in accordance with the provisions of the statute, the resolution of the Ninth Extraordinary Party Congress and the Eighteenth PZPR Voivodship Reports-Election Conference, and the resolutions of the subsequent plenary meetings of the Central Committee and Voivodship Committee. The political work of the political workers will be verified by the PZPR Voivodship Committee Executive Board.

2. The Voivodship Committee instructs the Intraparty Commission to appoint, by November 15, 1981, a group to consider the problem of forming a City Committee in Gdansk.

3. The Voivodship Committee notes for the record that the Executive Board will evaluate the work of the mass media and will submit this evaluation to the Voivodship Committee members.

4. The Voivodship Committee calls upon the Voivodship Party Central Committee (WKKP) to submit the results of all completed clarifying actions at the next plenary meeting.

5. In view of the compositions of the problem commissions, which are arousing reservations, the members of the central authorities from the Gdansk party organizations are obliged to submit the opinions on this, as contained in the protocol of the deliberations."/ [in boldface].

RADOM ENGINEERING SCHOOL RECTOR HEBDA INTERVIEWED

Lodz GLOS ROBOTNICZY in Polish 18 Nov 81 pp 1, 2

[Interview with Prof Michal Hebda, Rector of the Higher School of Engineering (WSI) in Radom by Pawel Patora, special emissary of GLOS ROBOTNICZY: "I Was Forced To Be a Candidate!", date and place not given]

[Text] [Question] Rector Hebda, it is difficult for journalists to get to talk with you...

[Answer] I am reluctant to talk with journalists, since their reports to date have been largely one-sided and have not helped matters. I would like some journalist finally to present the facts honestly, without hushing things up and making changes. Let him annotate his report later as he likes, but let the facts be published.

The mass media have created an atmosphere in which you have some kind of idiot here who is clinging spasmodically to his position.

[Question] But aren't you clinging to it?

[Answer] I do not want to be the rector here at all! I live in Warsaw. For 6 years I have commuted from Warsaw to Kielce or Radom. If this were to go on any longer, it would be counter to my personal, family, and professional interests. After all, I have received an offer for a much better job in Warsaw. I may check it out. If I remained here, it would be very difficult for me to satisfy the high material aspirations of the employees. For all of these reasons I tendered my resignation.

[Question] And yet, despite the fact that the Minister accepted this resignation, you resolved to be a candidate in the elections on 27 October.

[Answer] I was compelled to be a candidate. I was compelled to!

[Question] Who compelled you?

[Answer] My sense of morality. When representatives of nine organizations persuaded me between 7 pm and 1 am on the eve of the elections, it was difficult to stand firm.

[Question] But you were elected in a procedure that is now in dispute. After all that happened, why didn't you tender your resignation?

[Answer] The procedure was correct. The Senate convened the electoral commission, and the commission worked out the election regulations. The Senate confirmed these regulations, and the electoral commission carried out the elections in accordance with these regulations. The Senate ratified the election results unanimously and summoned the rector. Can one disregard this? Is all of this null and void? If I resigned, in what position would I leave the 800 people who declared for my candidacy?

[Question] First secretary of the PZPR School Committee Dr Wojciech Czerwiec told me that the party organization obliged you to be a candidate since it recognized that the program of educational institution development which you presented is the best one. What are the main assumptions of this program?

[Answer] This whole educational institution has had its curriculum planned by me from start to finish. My program for the future is, therefore, a continuation of what I have already done. I consider it necessary to strengthen and develop courses of studies and scientific research existing here which have no counterparts in Poland. We have emphasized those disciplines in which we can devise something valuable. These should be original directions. Duplicating directions which for years have been developed already in other large educational institutions such as the Academy of Mining and Metallurgy (AGH), Warsaw Technical University (Politechnika), etc does not provide an opportunity to rapidly reach meaningful results.

Therefore, we have, for example, the Institute of Prevention and Insurance, the only institution of its type in the CEMA countries (a few graduates of this institute are mechanics, a few are economists, and a few are organizers), and the Institute of Transport Systems, the courses at which exist nowhere else in Poland: crude oil technology, technology of explosive materials, artificial materials technology, footwear technology, economics of small-scale production, and many other courses found nowhere else.

When I came here there were several independent scientific employees. Their number has increased to about 40 now. There were not many more than 10 doctors, and now there are more than 100. In the course of 2 years (1979-1980) we have taken on 600 scientific employees. Apparatus worth 30-40 million zlotys has been expanded to apparatus worth approximately 300 million zlotys. The cost of investments implemented in these difficult times totals about half a billion zlotys. In 1978 rye was growing where we are speaking now. Two hostels (the third is nearing completion), the best student mess hall in Poland, a sports facility, and educational buildings have been erected. This development should be continued, and I assume this in my program. Bad vision or good, it is my own.

[Question] The implementation of this vision depends in large part on the methods employed. You are accused of having an autocratic, and even a despotic style of managing an educational institution... Do you think such methods are appropriate, and do you intend to change them?

[Answer] I believe that these are exceptionally humanitarian methods. One-man decisions, one-person responsibility give those who feel they have been wronged a chance for reversal of the decisions made. When decisions are made collegially, responsibility erodes. It is not true that these are autocratic methods. If we adopt some program following discussions, later I am not interested in having any more discussions. Programs once adopted must be carried to completion. First let us do something, and later let us discuss it. I do not like idle talk.

[Question] A while ago the session of the Senate of the WSI concluded. What was the subject of the deliberations?

[Answer] The first point of the daily order was an attempt to write an open letter to the higher school senates and colleges of rectors in some academic centers. Resolutions adopted by the colleges in Krakow, Gdansk, and other centers attest to the utter lack of information on the causes and course of what is occurring in these schools, for I do not suspect the rectors of having ill intent.

The second point was that the Senate adopted a position on the evaluation of the situation at WSI accomplished by the Conference of Higher Technical School Rectors, and on the suggestions conveyed to the Ministers by the 13 rectors and prorectors participating in this conference. These suggestions are unadoptable. The participants accuse us of having different voting regulations than other educational institutions had. They were exactly the same. Only after this whole "harangue" did they add one point concerning the election of the rector. The charge of lack of social consultation is odd. For pity's sake! Should the decision on conducting general elections be subject to social consultation? There was consultation on the previous draft of voting regulations for 9 months. I declare that I did not participate in efforts to prepare the draft. To this day I have not read the voting regulations.

[Question] Do you see some way to resolve the conflict constructively?

[Answer] We know that this educational institution and its interests are an element in the central political game. However, I provided a good solution, in my opinion, that was accepted by the Senate. First, we must break the strike immediately to facilitate the instruction of the 1,400 students involved, for there is no making up for losses. Second, there must be elections for new collegial authorities--faculty councils and a Senate. We must wade through this system until 15 January, when I complete all the budgetary and material matters. Then let the new Senate call for a vote of no confidence in me. Whoever wants to could determine the ceiling on the number of votes needed. If the no confidence vote passed, I would yield, and a new rector could be elected.

[Question] As far as I know, the strikers will not be inclined to accept this proposal...

[Answer] I know that they want to strike to the end. Let them strike, but it will be a very long strike, for I have my appointment until 1984. The strikers are a group of people blinded by passion. They are spreading a rumor that I would take vengeance if I remained. I have already proposed that we nullify this whole stike period, which would constitute a prelude to an agreement.

[Question] Would you be prepared to undertake negotiations with the Strike Committee?

[Answer] I would agree only if a consultative group were set up which offered to meet and talk with me. The strike has been a wildcat walkout up until now. The strikers have not even presented their demands, with which I became acquainted only during one of my meetings with the students.

[Question] Thank you for the interview.

SEDITIOUS DOCUMENTS, WEAPONS FOUND IN SOLIDARITY OFFICES

Warsaw ZOLNIERZ WOLNOSCI in Polish 18 Dec 81 p3

[Article: "What Were the Weapons For? Small Arsenal Found in Private Apartment"]

[Text] (Our own information) The concept of "confrontation" has recently come up many times in the mass media, and has awakened public anxiety, high feelings, and even horror. The threat of confrontation has been greater and greater, growing for several months, and recently after the "Solidarity" meetings in Radom and Gdansk, the vision of civil strife has become completely realistic. Today, then, the question of whether the activist extremists of "Solidarity" have been merely talking about confrontation or whether they have also been taking appropriate steps in the light of such a confrontation takes on particular significance.

The fact that this has not been limited merely to words was proved recently during a search made of the Mazovian Regional Headquarters of "Solidarity" in Warsaw. Materials were found, including instructions on how to proceed in the event of a state of emergency, given over the Television News during the past few days. The materials prove the union activists' preparations for a struggle and also for action contrary to the law and against the authorities. Confrontation was intended. It was represented as one of the stages of the struggle for power, a struggle which was to satisfy the personal ambitions of certain activists and which could involve numerous victims.

Alongside the propaganda and directive-type materials found in the "Solidarity" headquarters in Warsaw were also objects the nature of which provides a clue as to the purpose of their being stored and their possible final use. A metal club weighing about 3 kilograms was hidden under a piece of paper. A baton with a container with paralyzing gas in it produced in one of the Western countries was also found there. It is supposed that this is a model for the production of other such batons. For example, they are discussed in the instructions formulating the principles of how to proceed in the event that a state of emergency is declared.

Another confusing incident occurred on Thursday the 17th of this month in Piotrkow Trybunalski. Col Zbigniew Pudysz, spokesman for the Ministry of Internal Affairs, states that there had been an interrogation of two employees of the Glassmaking Machine Factory there, a 22-year old, Andrzej Lipinski, and 28-year old Wlodzimierz Rozycki, members of "Solidarity," and a small arsenal of firearms was found. There were four locally-produced pistols, two with silencers, already fired, ready for use at a moment's notice. They were being stored and were concealed. Also found in the hiding-place were ammunition and components of other firearms. Both men stated that they had hidden the weapons upon hearing that a state of war was coming into their area of the country. This was therefore a deliberate action in violation of the decree clearly stating that weapons should be turned over to the appropriate authorities within 24 hours of promulgation.

Of course there are other ways of interpreting the fact that Piotrkow "Solidarity" members produced and stored firearms, but there is no doubt that this was an act subject to criminal proceedings. Besides that, the two men's explanation seem naive.

Lt Col Stanislaw Trafalski of the investigative office of the Ministry of Internal Affairs said that men had said they were collectors of old weapons and wanted to add the pistols to their collection, but added that we should remember that it was with just such a weapon that a taxi driver was murdered in Piotrkow in June. What were the weapons found in the possession of the two "Solidarity" members to be used for? The investigation being energetically pursued will learn the answer to that question.

HISTORIC ROOTS OF UNITY BETWEEN ARMY, PEOPLE

Bucharest VIATA MILITARA in Romanian Nov 81 pp 10, 13

[Article by Maj Gen Dr Ilie Ceausescu: "The Historical Roots of the Unity Between the Army and the People--a Characteristic Trait"]

[Text] The glorious history of our people attests that the Romanian Communist Party is a legitimate heir of the advanced thought and action, of the over-2,000-year-long struggle for social and national emancipation, of the ideals of freedom, independence and sovereignty of the Romanian people. Our party has demonstrated an extensive power of analysis and synthesis, ability in using the objective laws of social development, maturity in mastering the outlook of dialectical and historical materialism and applying it creatively to Romania's conditions, in utilizing the conclusions and lessons resulting from the experience of the struggles for social and national liberation, the advanced positions and ideas of the revolutionary and socialist movement in our country regarding the defense of the homeland, regarding the indissoluble ties between the military organism and the broad masses of people.

As the multimillennial historical experience accumulated by the Romanians attests, our people have fought continually in an unwavering unity with the army to defend their freedom, independence and native land, being obliged to put forth an extensive military effort, to wage endless battles against the invaders or those who encroached upon the homeland's sovereignty. This urgently necessitated the finding of solutions, methods, forms of fighting, tactical and strategic ideas corresponding to the given situation, meant to secure victory under the conditions when the numerical and technical superiority on a military plane belonged to the invaders.

In the fight against the invaders, the Romanian people intuited, worked out and used with greater and greater efficiency the idea and method of the united struggle with the army, mobilizing all the material and spiritual resources in order to defeat or repel the attackers.

The indissoluble tie between the people and the army appeared among the Romanians, in primary forms, as early as in the time of the Geto-Dacians, who organized a broad popular resistance against invaders superior on a military plane. "From the formation of the centralized Dacian state by Burebista in the 1st century B.C., from the era of Decebal's flourishing Dacian society and then through 2,000 years of existence, up to the present day," the secretary general of the party points out, "our people had to carry on hard struggles to form and defend their own being, their national entity." The matter of the joint struggle of the whole populace with the army appeared among the Romanians out of the need to defend themselves from the invaders. It can be said, without fear of being wrong, that the joint struggle of the people with the army for the defense of the homeland was and is an objective necessity for our country, springing from the need to defend themselves, to defeat the invaders and those who nourished such thoughts, to safeguard the basic interests of the Romanian people, their right to life and free development, masters of their own fate, free to develop themselves in conformity with their aspirations of civilization and peace. "The whole history of the Romanian people," it says in the party's program, "presents itself as the history of endless class struggles, of the battles waged by the broad masses of people for freedom and social justice, for independence and the defense of national being, for progress and civilization."

The art of the joint actions of the army and the people was applied constantly by the Romanian people's great leaders and commanders of armies, such as Burebista, Decebal, Basarab I, Mircea the Old, Vlad Tepes, Stephen the Great, Michael the Brave and many others, who employed in a contemporary fashion and on a wide scale forms and methods of all kinds, the use of all the means of fighting that they could have on hand in order to be able to cause losses to the enemy, including those improvised or invented in wartime, and so on.

In the course of time, the relationship between the army and the people among the Romanians constituted not only a permanent feature but also an educational condition for the defense of the ancestral land both in ancient times and in the Middle Ages, when the war against the invaders was going on at its peak and with results of the most positive kind, without a well-knit theory, a system of ideas and precepts, a doctrine having been worked out. The existence and use of this practice proved its utility in the day-by-day activity, in the fight against the invaders. Another period (specific to the domination of the bourgeois regime) then followed, one in which the concept of the joint struggle of the army with the people was theorized, and precepts and ideas were worked out, but because of the policy of exploitation conducted by the ruling classes, because of the irreconcilable conflict between the bourgeoisie and the working masses, the tie between the army and the people did not always find its application in practice.

Taking up and developing traditions of joint struggle of the generation of 1848, the socialist movement in Romania devoted special attention to the problems of the struggle of the whole populace and the army for the defense of the homeland, of its national independence and sovereignty.

With the transformation of the socialist party into the Romanian Communist Party, there began a new stage in the evolution of the concept of the joint struggle of the whole populace with the army for the defense of the homeland. As early as May 1921, the Romanian Communist Party put in its programmatic documents the ideas of the struggle of the army together with the masses. This idea was developed throughout the period up to 23 August 1944, in the light of the themes of the classics of Marxism-Leninism, with the Romanian Communist Party acting effectively to put them into practice. The participation of the whole army alongside the Romanian people in carrying out the antifascist and anti-imperialist national armed insurrection confirmed the correctness of the political line of the Romanian Communist Party in the field of the struggle of the army with the whole populace, its scientific character. After 23 August 1944, in the achievement of the antifascist and anti-imperialist revolution for social and national liberation, throughout the period of the socialist revolution and construction, the idea of the joint struggle of the people together with the army evolved continually, was developed in accordance with the concrete conditions of each stage, becoming in our times a constant practice that is the basis for the instruction and training of our whole populace for the defense of the socialist homeland. In the stage of the forging of the multilaterally developed socialist society, it has been possible to achieve, at unprecedented dimensions, an indissoluble tie between the army and the whole populace for the defense of our socialist homeland.

For the Romanian people, who have carried on endless struggles for over 2,000 years in order to defend their ancestral land, being obliged to continually confront invaders stronger from a military viewpoint, the joint struggle of the people and the army was and is an objective necessity, prescribed by the need to negate the superiority of the attacker and to obtain victories in extremely difficult situations, with fewer forces and means of fighting then the attacker. Under these conditions, utilizing highly efficient procedures and forms of fighting, means of fighting from the most modern ones to improvised ones, exhibiting inexhaustible initiative and ingenuity in these directions, using simultaneous, continual, diverse attacks, on all sides and everywhere, against the enemy, panic, confusion, demoralization, fatigue, fear and disbelief in victory are produced in the ranks of the invader, his fighting capacity is reduced systematically, the delaying of his actions is obtained, depriving him of the possibility of utilizing his superiority on a military plane, creating for him the image of the specter of death at every turn, causing him losses in troops and means of fighting, and compelling him, ultimately, to abandon the territories conquered. At the same time, the objective necessity of the joint struggle calls for the maintenance of the fighting spirit of the army and the people who are defending their native land, in order to stimulate the confidence of the fighters of all categories in victory over the attacker, to increase their force of action and to keep their morale high--indispensable conditions for defeating a strong and treacherous attacker.

In their heroic struggle for the defense of the ancestral land, the Romanian people have drawn the conclusion, of incontestable value, according to which the standing army has always constituted the basic component element of the armed struggle, its spinal cord. Over the millennia, in the times of great trial for the fate of the homeland, the standing army has played an active role, allying itself with the broad masses of people, fighting together against the invaders and gaining victories of historic importance. The basis for these results lay in the social composition of the armies, since they were formed, for the most part, of sons of the working people who had the same aspirations as the people. The continual, unbroken unity between the people and the army over the centuries has constituted a distinct, characteristic trait of the armed struggle among the Romanians and, at the same time, an essential factor in all the victories obtained in the fight against invaders of any kind. The close, indissoluble tie of the people with the army--always deeply animated by the same ideals and aspirations as the broad masses of people--has had a decisive role in its evolution in the contemporary era, permitting its transformation into a socialist, revolutionary army, concomitantly with the changes occurring in the social, economic and political life of the country. Closely tied to the people, to their highest ideals, the army of socialist Romania is fully prepared, determined to do everything, together with the whole populace, in order to fulfill at the highest parameters the noble mission that the homeland has entrusted to it.

Under our country's conditions, in accordance with the idea of the struggle of the whole populace for the defense of the homeland, the role that goes to the army in the national system of defense not only is not declining but, on the contrary, is increasing. This fact necessitates the continual improvement of the instruction of the military to a high qualitative level in the light of the requirements of the military doctrine of socialist Romania.

Starting from the highly responsible mission entrusted to the army in the defense of the fate of the country, together with the whole nation, the secretary general of the Romanian Communist Party points out, "Therefore preparing ourselves for a defensive war, against aggression, it is normal for our army to be--through its entire activity, through all that it does, through its political and combat training--directly tied only to our people, to be only under the command of the party and state bodies of socialist Romania."

DRAGOSAVAC INTERVIEWED ON NOVI SAD TELEVISION

LD160946 Belgrade TANJUG Domestic Service in Serbo-Croatian 1419 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Text] Novi Sad, 15 Dec (TANJUG)--Regardless of all the difficulties, I view with optimism the preparations and the goals of our 12th LCY Congress and believe that it will maintain the live of continuity of the revolution and of Tito's achievements. This was asserted by Dr Dusan Dragosavac, president of the LCY Central Committee Presidium to Jelena Cvetkovic in an interview for Novi Sad television that will be broadcast tonight on Yugoslav radio and television.

It is natural that many questions concerning stabilization and the developments in our economic and political life dominate the congress preparations, and this will certainly be so at the top gathering of Yugoslav communists.

Asked to say what, for lack of a better word, the controversial questions of our political system are, Dragosavac began by recalling the generally known international assessment that the world is in a rather deep crisis, both political and economic. In a certain way it reflects on us as a part of this world, and it is essential that we be aware of it and that we take all the necessary measures in our system and in our work to overcome these difficulties.

For several decades now, Dragosavac said, we as a country have experienced both economic and cultural dynamism and social and political development. Yugoslavia is now at the level of a medium-developed country, which means that we have improved our position and that we have reduced the difference between us and the most developed countries. This has also been a characteristic of our development in the period between the two congresses--so much so that according to some estimates, we now have a national per capita income of approximately $3,300.

More important than all material things is our sociopolitical system. The question of the socialist self-management system within our country, the development and advance of national equality, brotherhood and unity and the affirmation of the concept of the working class and its historic interests. And so is, of course, the question of the development of the (?character) of social ownership, socially owned means of production and socialization of some state functions and policy, and it is important that this should, in fact, yield results.

Dragosavac stressed this at the beginning of the conversation, pointing out that he did not wish to speak of this crisis in the world in order to justify our difficulties but to affirm that we should be aware of it and that we should organize ourselves better to overcome external influences and our own shortcomings.

We must take into account the fact that as a country of average development, we can open ourselves economically and let the positive influence of the more productive world have an impact on us. Admittedly, this is not a new idea, because such an opening has been characteristic of our development. We are not an isolated country. On the contrary, we have been and are a most open country in terms of communication and cooperation, and this should be nurtured still further, of course, even now.

When his attention was drawn to the fact that as far as the so-called controversial questions of our political system are concerned, the view is increasingly heard that our self-management is stagnating, Dusan Dragosavac said, among other things, that the question of the development of the social character of the means of production, the self-management of these social resources, the socialization of these social functions, and the state ones too, including all-people's defense and social self-protection, is not controversial. According to Dragosavac, the question of brotherhood and unity, equality and nonalignment is not controversial.

For our socialist legal development, with all that this implies, Dragosavac asserted, these are questions that require no discussion. The only question that is asked is how to develop this better and more successfully. The inadequate development of our self-management system and the shortcomings within it make things difficult for us, and it is up to us to overcome this, eliminate it and advance without hesitation.

[Question] What are these subjective weaknesses and reasons: How would you, Comrade Dragosavac, describe them within the context of the criticism of the slow linking up, of associated labor on the basis of self-management?

[Answer] First of all, I would say that there are also some objective elements. We have reached a degree of socioeconomic development from which a new, higher quality step forward should be made. This is the question of when social reproduction, in particular expanded reproduction, should be socialized, and when linked up associated labor should carry out this function. The influence exerted by factors outside the economy is still great, in particular on expanded reproduction, and in this context perhaps the executive organs, too, play too great a role. This role should not be underestimated. The executive organs will play this role to a significant extent in the future as well, as will the administrative organs in all areas. The question that arises is only in whose service is this role. It is present less in the service of associated labor, of self-management, in the service of precisely the socialization of expanded reproduction and linking up of associated labor. However, should it be in this service, then this role is in line with the historical interests of the working class and in line with socialism and is therefore a positive role.

In this connection Dragosavac said that we have considerable weaknesses in this respect. He noted that there has been some criticism of these subjective forces, of the league of communists, the delegate system and executive organs. This criticism is valid, though in this respect, too, there are various kinds of criticism. We should be trained in order that we might develop as much as possible through our entire system--from the socialist alliance, the trade unions, the youth groups, the league of communists--in order that everybody examines first and foremost the problems that he should resolve. We have perhaps at present too many of those who only see problems with others and less with themselves. Communists must not become isolated, must not have tunnel vision; they must successfully carry our their tasks on the job and not defend one sector over another, because after all, all of us work in sectors.

With regard to Yugoslavia, Dragosavac goes on, we are a federal community. It cannot be anything else either, in view of the national composition and historical elements. This is our great achievement and advantage. However, it is no coincidence that we have decreed that the league of communists cannot be a federal organization but, on the contrary, a unified organization, because it ensures the unity of the system in which all our working people are vitally interested. Above all, their interest is to overcome exploitation, classes and a class society. This is a question of further promoting genuine socialist democracy. This is not a question of pluralism of political interests but a question of objectively acknowledging the existence of various interests in society and then resolving them successfully from unified positions.

The attention of the president of the LCY Central Committee Presidium was drawn to the fact that assertions are often heard about republics and provinces creating their own national economies, that we are building togetherness at the expense of the particular as well as the particular at the expense of togetherness.

[Answer] Well, you see, even during the war and immediately afterwards our party, led by Tito and by a whole galaxy of revolutionaries, Kardelj and others, rightly grasped and linked this social and national element in our country. By proceeding precisely from social, class interests, historical interests of the working class, although the country was at that time also underdeveloped, the historical tendencies and the social trends were correctly assessed and on this basis the solution of the national question was also placed at the focus of attention, because at that time there were six republican governments, and a seventh top of that. Even at that time various people often spoke, some with good intentions and some maliciously, both at home and abroad; well, it was easy to bring down a government in the old Yugoslavia, but it is difficult now to overthrow seven, or nine today, in view of the fact that we have two provinces.

This, in fact, is expressed a little symbolically, but before the war, as it is known, Yugoslavia was a unitarist state, inequality was expressed in it through this single government and it was, therefore, easy to do this. However, there is now a different system here in which all are equal.

Dragosavac stresses that the republics and provinces are one of our great achievements which should continue to be developed and nurtured, and it will be necessary to do this for a long time. "When there are nations, when there are republics and provinces, they cannot be reduced to some kind of cultural autonomy. This is not in the spirit of Marxism and this is not our program. We know whose program it is but we have overcome it. What is at stake here is the question of the entity as well as the question of economic problems and economic interests. In this respect we should not shrink from, if you like, even national, so to say, republican and provincial economies. What is essential and what should be done is to overcome capital relations in general. This is a question pertaining to both republic and province, every section and in the federation. Our weaknesses also stem partly from the fact that we are overcoming this still too slowly, and if capitals clash then this can easily also transfer itself to nationalism. In this respect we then resolve the problems with greater difficulties and the opposite is also ture: if we overcome this--and this is in the historical interest of the working class--only then will there be no troubles but, on the contrary this will be of advantage to everyone carrying out his function in his sphere." [Quote mark as received]

[Question] What about those famous obstacles of ours to artificial sovereignties? Was the next question addressed to Dragosavac.

[Answer] If this is also the sovereignty of the working people, a sovereignty linked with the working class, with the nation and with equality, then this sovereignty is positive, and vice versa. Of course, there are still those negative elements. Not it is a question of a way out. We have many now who think that the problem lies in our returning to the system which we had, which the others too have. This shows great weaknesses--as if we can ignore the republics and provinces. On the other hand, many think that the way out lies even in returning to some elements of the capitalist system. Since difficulties have emerged, many come forward who simply advocate one system or another. However, we see that these systems are experiencing a total crisis and that our weaknesses stem from the fact that there are still certain elements of both systems present in our country, Dragosavac said, and stressed that we must consistently develop self-management and associate labor and thus overcome the weaknesses of both systems. This is also the essence of the precongress debates and of the plans in the economic policy, to train ourselves to resolve these matters.

What also arises now is the question of federalism in the LCY, the relative differences in the understanding of the term and the essence of this so-called federalism are noticeable. But what we have are disagreements and lack of unity in the political and economic life. Do we have a unified league of communists at all or do the republics and provinces and even municipalities have "their own" league of communists?

Dragosavac believes that it is now abnormal for discussions to be held on these issues and for there to be different concepts, in particular just now before the congress. However, he thinks that it is not good or normal that other concepts are appearing which are not in the spirit of our league of communists program and that there is not sufficient political resistance to that.

Saying that in our multinational community, equality, national characteristics and individuality should be manifested, but that unity too is needed, Dragosavac stresses that this unity is the support of the league of communists. The unified interest of all is precisely this historical interest of the working class. This implies the social character of the means of production in the whole of Yugoslavia, and implies that the elements and vestiges of state ownership should be overcome, that private ownership in the sense of private capitalist ownership should be overcome, though there is less of that in our country. Dragosavac pointed out that it is no coincidence that the constitution stipulates that the league of communists must preserve the unity of the system. This is a joint interest, an interest of all, and communists in all delegate assemblies should fight for it. Therefore the question of democratic centralism, of both of its elements, is fundamental for us. We have to develop democracy and discussion when policy is formulated but at the same time we must ensure discipline in implementing the policy, in the sense that this policy ensures unity which, naturally, takes into consideration certain specific features and makes initiative possible. However, as regards these fundamental issues of the socialist self-managing system and its nonaligned policy no concession of any kind can be made to anybody." [Quote mark as received]

Dragosavac agreed with the view that in discussions, the principle of federalist relations in the league of communists is sometimes introduced instead of applying the fundamental principle of democratic centralism, and it then happens that democratic centralism in the league of communists and, let us say, social agreement-making, are opposed to each other in an antagonistic way.

There are elements which the League of Communists must overcome. First and foremost, in order to avoid falling into pragmatism, it must develop and adopt all the results of contemporary science, and stimulate and develop science and Marxism. But, on the other hand, this distinguishes it from some kind of pragmatic narrow organization which has no prospects and does not open up perspectives. Similarly, the league of communists must not remain at the level of discussions, for in this case it would be transformed into some kind of discussion club, Dragosavac says. When it is a question of the composition of the league of communists leadership, one often discusses whether we need only high-brow intellectuals or workers as well. We need both, Dragosavac says, adding "that in committees they do not write dissertations, as we have universities for that." And precisely in order for the league of communist to be--and it is--a revolutionary organization, it must link both elements. It must also fight constantly against dogmatism, for Marxism is a science, and not some kind of dogma. This is a method for the promotion of social processes, for analyses. We must fight against sectarianism, for communists have never considered that they themselves are sufficient in order to develop and promote. This was a characteristic of our party and remains so, which our people were able to turn to their own historic interests in order for tasks to be carried out. The party must be everywhere where social problems are resolved.

It was suggested to Dragosavac that in the last few months it has been demonstrated that in the league of communists a two-fold attitude has been discussed increasingly in relation to carrying out what has been agreed and returning some kind of ethical image to communists.

[Answer] Yes, there are quite a few problems here. This has always been very important for the League of Communists. However, in the League of Communists there has never been any dispute over those basic human values. This is the question of freedom and democracy. It is, then, always essential to estimate what kind of freedoms are in question, and what kind of democracy, as well as whose class interest. We must, first and foremost, take account of the fact that classes are formed in production and that this is the central issue. I have been talking to the comrades here in some collectives, and it is encouraging to see that despite all the difficulties they are to a certain extent free of those negative phenomena and penetration by various other weaknesses. This is what is encouraging, but it also points to the League of Communists obligations as a whole, and those of its leaderships, to fight more resolutely in other spheres in which something else is needed. When I spoke with all the Novi SAD collectives, I could see that the main concern was the issue of how this system should be linked and promoted. I could also see that the more developed collectives not only link up within Yugoslavia but also with others outside. This is a problem before us, how to make this much broader, better and more effective.

[Question] Comrade Dragosavac, our principled solutions to the national question and the organization of the federation and so forth are well known. Our practice is also well known. How do you, from the point of view of national relations and the equality of the nations and nationalities, assess the problems in this sphere, which were also set out in a certain way at the last session of the LCY Central Committee?

[Answer] The national problem, Dragosavac replied, must always be linked with the social problem, for we can only solve it successfully here from the positions of the interests of the working class, of self-management and associated labor. And for us, this is beyond any discussion, this is something about which we will not enter into any kind of dialogue with anyone. For us the question of the equality of the nations and nationalities is a question above discussion. This is the essence of Marxism, the essence of the program, and that is why it was put into the constitution.

However, we are conscious of the fact, and we must be so, that while society is a class society, while the world is as it is, regardless of the results which are achieved by socialism and other progressive forces, as long as there is such a thing as a nation. This positive program of national equality will always remain topical for us.

If we develop equality in a positive program, then we shall be more successful in the struggle against nationalism. Broader penetration onto the political scene by nationalism is only possible during individual moments of the slowing down of the development of self-management, vacillation or insufficient unity. I think that we have these elements now.

Dragosavac emphasizes "that we must, as Tito did, constantly emphasize brotherhood and unity, and affirm complete equality. And here we have taken a great step forward in affirming not only the nations, but also the nationalities, as completely equal, as well as overcoming the concept of national minorities. Our republics and provinces have specific national features and the states of sociopolitical communities are national...." Dragosavac adds that in this way we have managed to create a situation in which there are no national minorities and no more peoples which are more state-forming or less state-forming, a situation in which these nations and nationalities of ours experience this Yugoslavia on an equal footing and do not look, as they say, "over the fence." They were the initiators of overcoming this concept of national minorities. Because of this, we can justly assert that they also opted for this socialist self-managing Yugoslavia. And we must continue to develop this moment, even against everything that is trying to destroy it, and as communists we must fight resolutely and in an ideopolitical way in the Socialist Alliance, the youth organizations, the trade unions and all other sociopolitical organizations. Naturally, Dragosavac says, it is not by chance that we envisaged other measures for the class enemy where it is a question of the dissemination of religious and national hatred.

Viewed historically we have had, and still have, individual clericalists in these organizations who are not reconciled to what our revolution has established once and for all and to the fact that in its solutions it went further than a bourgeois revolution. The French bourgeois revolution, for example, cleared up relations of the separation of church and state, and the state from education. Naturally, in our revolution we were able to go further, and we did so. This is now the result of the constitution and our laws, and they are issues which we will not discuss with anyone. Nor will we permit any kind of demand that we should go back in this sense, or the demand of any religious community to interfere as an organization in national relations. This would mean introducing intolerance. It is something else when individual nationalists in collusion with clericalists often act negatively, while pretending to be concerned for the nation. We must oppose this resolutely, above all by our political means, by explaining this to the people.

Dragosavac recalls the fact that in its program the League of Communists says that it is incompatible for the membership to be linked with various religious convictions or for them to coexist with various ideologies. Discussion within the League of Communists from positions of Marxism on how to work better and behave oneself are one thing, but it is quite a different thing to solve within the socialist alliance various self-management interests, again, on the main directions of the promotion of socialism, brotherhood and unity, the development of self-management and of associated labor and so forth. In our society there is coexistence between people of various ideological orientations and, as Dragosavac says, "the question of theistic believers and atheists. We do not enter into this private sphere, and everyone is free to be in the League of Communists if he adopts its program and statute. In the Socialist Alliance and self-management, regardless of whether they are atheists or theists, they are equal, but if anyone divides them on this basis, then we take measures, regardless of whether they are theists or atheists. In this sense too, we must struggle against sectarianism in the league of communism and opportunism. This is a constant theme, for there will always be both one and the other."

Replying to the question about international cooperation of the League of Communist of Yugoslavia and the manifested impression that our public and party membership do not have enough knowledge of this, Dragosavac said that we have a very broad cooperation of this kind. Our party and the revolution, with Tito and Kardelj at their head, before, during and after the war proceeded. By tradition, from the fact that we are never self-sufficient, we have tried to carry out in the best possible way our tasks of the continuity of the revolution which also includes our obligations toward the world. This was created a prestige for us in the world; we have established very broad ties in the sphere of state relations, in particular in the nonaligned movement and at the United Nations. We have been the pioneers in the affirmation of cooperation by countries with different systems, of noninterference in the internal affairs. We have demonstrated that the time has come for small people too. If they are on the right course, representing much and that "the great" can no longer shape their destiny. This is the example which we have set and many examples demonstrate this, along this line of the league of communists we have consistently helped every revolutionary movement and are helping and will help also in the future.

[Question] There is more and more talk about the new phenomena of pseudoliberalism in arts, publicist work and journalism. Can you, Comrade Dragosavac, throw more light on these phenomena, their scope and genesis? Is there continuity in all this starting with the seventies?

[Answer] There is continuity but it is a different matter when this emerges on the political scene sometimes to a greater, sometimes a lesser degree. As I have said earlier as long as a nation exists there will be problems not only of the national but also of nationalistic phenomena. And something similar exists also here in the above-mentioned sphere. We have three attitudes: the first is the bourgeois, the second dogmatic--that which we often call Stalinist--and both have conditions for existence, they have their continuity. And then there is that third attitude of ours: the dominant socialist self-managing one. At individual points in time when difficulties grow greater, when a crisis hits the world and when crisis elements arise in our country too, then the two former aspects are more prominent on the political scene.

Dragosavac says that regarding the issues of culture and science we clarified with our program a long time ago that the league of communists is not any kind of arbiter in this respect, neither are its forums. In this respect we should allow full breadth. It is known that people do not agree on aesthetic issues, the tastes differ and this is not disputed. The league of communists neither usurps a monopoly nor does it acknowledge monopoly to anybody else and it must fight against these monopolies. But what the league of communists must do, since it is not a sector-like but a revolutionary organization, is to fight against alien ideological concepts in these spheres too.

[Question] The 12th Congress of the LCY will be the first congress to be held without Comrade Tito, the man who set the tone of all the congress of Yugoslav communists. We are already now describing the forthcoming congress as a Titoist congress, as the congress of consistency, affirmation and unfolding of fresh prospects for socialist self-management. What do you think about that? This was the last question put by Novi Sad television.

[Answer] By proceeding from the continuity of our revolution, that is from its further development, Dragosavac stresses that the revolution can never stop. If it stops, if it is reduced to history, then this is the end of it as a revolution. The course of self-management, of socialism, the course of associating of labor, of equality, of brotherhood and unity and of nonaligned policy--these are the issues which should be developed further and promoted before the congress and then at the congress tasks regarding this course set. This represents continuity, the continuity of our line, the protagonists of which are Tito, as the leader of our party for many years, for decades. But I would mention in this context that in that period we also lost another personality such as Kardelj was, before that we lost Vlahovic, Milentije Popovic and many others. But, between the two congresses we lost two personalities who had never separated themselves from the revolution. And, it goes without saying, that an even greater obligation is borne by us. That is, that we affirm this line, Dusan Dragosavac, president of the LCY Central Committee presidium, said at the end of his interview to Novi Sad television.

KOSOVO'S HASANI ANALYZES PROBLEMS

LD172218 Belgrade TANJUG Domestic Service in Serbo-Croatian 1221 GMT 17 Dec 81

[Text] Pristina 17 Dec (TANJUG)--Sinan Hasani, member of the Kosovo League of Communists Provincial Committee presidium and of the LCY Central Committee, in a conversation with Pristina radio-television editor Alui Aluaj, gave an all-round picture of the importance of the LCY's political platform for Kosovo and for the whole of our community. In Hasani's opinion the essential part in the platform is a social analysis of the counterrevolutionary events in Kosovo, that is an examination of the basic is causes which facilitated the operation of Albanian irredentists. The causes, Hasani emphasized, must first and foremost be sought in the erroneous policy on Kosovo's development.

As is well known, Sinan Hasani went on, immediately after the war and for several years afterward, the structure of the population was such that the majority consisted of peasants, with about 80 percent of the inhabitants engaged in agriculture. However, later on it came about that young people left the villages in large numbers and flooded the towns in a desire to be educated, even to be educated for civil service professions. When we look at the composition or the structure of our university in Pristina, then we shall see that about 70 percent of students have studied the arts while the productive branches were neglected, for fewer people were interested in that; only about 30 percent of students. This created quite a lot of problems and other difficulties for in this specific situation people could see no more secure prospects for themselves.

In addition, Hasani continued, people who studied the arts, for instance, such as history, literature, languages, sociology and other spheres, somehow did not get close to our development and sometimes even hampered this development--I am thinking here of the development of socialist self-management--because they often dealt with some problems or other representing romaticism, particularly in the sphere of history, literature and so forth.

I feel that the platform attributes particular importance to elucidating the role of management in these situations, the role of the political party leadership in the province, the document states that all these social trends have happened to us without these problems being overcome by the further development of our self-managing system, by the further development of unity, brotherhood and community. Such trends often gained in scope so as even to bring the community into question. This occasionally harmed our unity too, for the conviction was formed that our development depends exclusively upon what the community can give and not upon adequate mobilization of all the subjective forces in the province.

For 7 months our sociopolitical activity has been conducted on the basis of the program of action of the League of Communists Provincial Committee. It can surely be said that we have achieved considerable, visible results. The first thing, which in my opinion is very important, is that working people, peasants and young people have been able to see with whom they are dealing. We have, however, come up against nationalism which has in the final analysis inflicted the greatest harm primarily upon the very people within which it manifests itself, in this specific situation upon the Albanian people itself. How and why is it precisely the Albanian people? Because nationalism represents a bourgeois ideology and policy, a profascist ideology. If anyone has inflicted damage upon the Albanian people, then this has been done in the first place by racism and the bourgeoisie which have for decades and centuries exploited this people.

In addition, nationalist ideology is very dangerous particularly for development, for unity and first and foremost for the working people, regardless of to which nation or nationality they belong. Accordingly, nationalist manifestations have damaged our struggle and our efforts exerted in the aim of further developing brotherhood and unity between the nations and nationalities in our province and in the whole country. I say this because I think that it is very important that the people and the working people, primarily the Albanians, begin to understand with whom they are dealing; that very sombre forces are involved which directly threaten the interests of the Albanian people and the brotherhood, unity, and community of all the nations and nationalities living in our province.

I think that through our specific actions against nationalist elements and through specific political work and actions we have managed to isolate to a considerable degree the nationalist and irredentist element and, on the other hand to introduce a more accurate concept of the policy of brotherhood and unity in our country.

In answer to a question as to what results have been achieved in preventing the emigration of Serbs and Montenegrins from Kosovo, Hasani said.

The problem of emigration or the problem of population movement is a problem which has long accompanied human society. However, you are right. The question is posed in the context of the program of aciton which we have adopted. In fact, the question of the emigration of Serbs and Montenegrins is posed from the viewpoint of a reactionary nationalist ideology, platform and policy, for these forces aimed at making the population of Kosovo a pure ethnic Albanian one, in order thereby to present other political specific demands relating to the matter of the republic or relating to the matter of the so-called Marxist-Leninist political organization as they call themselves. In relation to this we acted wholly justifiably and with political maturity when we set out with the appropriate analysis to prevent artificial emigration or emigration under pressure. For all the analayses showed that not all emigrations occur under pressure. There were such emigrations and similar manifestations, however.

In the program of action therefore, we did not say that emigration of Serbs and Montenegrins was taking place only because of pressure and nationalist irredentist policy and not permitting them to take place. If we compare data on these movements, that is on the emigration of Serbs and Montenegrins from Kosovo during the last 10 years and in the course of the period since the manifestation of counter-revolutionary events, then we may say there are now fewer cases of such emigrations. I think we have succeeded in preventing such a process, which was in fact unnatural or imposed by nationalist and irredentist reactionary forces.

I think that there is sometimes a certain opportunism, Hasani commented, so that people do not see the importance of this question sufficiently. It sometimes happens that adequate measures are not undertaken such as, for instance, those which are undertaken against any manifestation of nationalism. In the final analysis, wherever we have pressures relating to the emigration of Serbs and Montenegrins, and I reiterate that such instances have taken place, then it would be wholly justified for measures to be undertaken such as those undertaken against those responsible for demonstrations and against people organized in illegal hostile organizations. The gravity of such nationalism is no less than that of taking part in demonstrations for it represents a counterrevolutionary action and a hostile phenomenon.

In this respect we are therefore confronted by very serious tasks for in the future, too, we must struggle to prevent such manifestations in the aim of suppressing emigration in order to recover the full trust of the working people. This Kosovo belongs to all of us. This Kosovo is our home, our environment in which we live together, and in which we shall share together every good and evil. In no case can we permit brotherhood and unity to be brought into question so many years after the revolution.

Answering a question about the dimensions of the indoctrination of greater Albanian irredentism, Hasani said that this had more or less encompassed both economic and cultural life to a great degree. I consider that that indoctrination can be perceived also in certain of our scientific, cultural and other works and creativity, and also in our educational and upbringing process, particularly in regard to glorification of certain issues along the lines of national romaticism. We have not devoted sufficient attention to the problems of education on the basis of our achievements, our revolution and Yugoslav socialist patriotism. This indoctrination has penetrated in various ways and in various forms which cannot be perceived at first glance but when a person looks a little more deeply, then he sees all those goals and sees that it was not healthy or that it was reactionary.

Speaking then of Albanian propaganda, Hasani said that Enver Hoxha and other individual Albanian leaders were trying to encourage political activity against the sovereignty and integrity of our country. They are coming forward with direct territorial claims and in so doing fully identify themselves with Albanian irredentism and nationalism in Kosovo, rendering them open support and encouraging them to continue this sort of activity. This propaganda by Albania is quite intensive and it is well known that this is not in anybody's interest and even less in the interest of the Albanian people here or of Albanians in Albania. When I say that it is not in the interest of the Albanian people either here or there this means that it is even less in the interest of the Balkans and the situation prevailing in the world because it can be clearly seen that the deterioration of such relations is used by the great powers for the implementation of their objectives. The present situation in the world is very complex and everyone bears a great responsibility indeed for its exacerbation, particularly making such demands.

Yugoslavia will never permit its integrity and sovereignty to be violated and its borders to be violated which are the result also of the struggle of the Albanian people which fought together with other Yugoslav peoples and which has created this country together with all the nations and nationalities in socialist Yugoslavia to which it belongs.

It is becoming even clearer to us, stressed Hasani, that the question of the republic, that is to say of the slogan "Kosovo-Republic," does not stem from a need or from some problem that Kosovo has not resolved its status in our socialist community, either as a social political community or from the international aspect or from the aspect of international policy. For instance, we know that Kosovo was autonomy.

Bearing in mind out self-management principles and our self-management policy Kosovo is in a position to decide all significant questions just as the republics decide about the future of the country. It has the same rights as the republics both when what is involved is a situation of internal development and when foreign policy is involved. I will say it again that it has all the right that belongs to it. Accordingly, stressed Hasani, the demand for the republican status does not stem from something that it allegedly does not have with regard to a principled solution of the autonomous status of the province, including the position of the Albanian nationality. It represents, in fact, an aspiration of the nationalists and irredentists; in fact their aim of destroying socialist Yugoslavia. They know full well that the slogan of having a republic represents something which is attractive to inadequately informed people. They thought that in so doing they will win them over and gain a few points. However, in terms of their concept, by setting up the Republic of Kosovo they thought that they would change the constitutional order in Yugoslavia. However no one has the right on which the people themselves have decided. The people adopted the constitution and laid down the appropriate organization of the country. This is why these are unacceptable demands.

However, I wanted to say that the thought behind it is to discredit Yugoslavia. These are the two reasons which testify that other interests, too, are involved in this. First of all, Yugoslavia is a very popular country which is building its own socialism and developing its own path into socialism which this does not suit the enemy. In particular it does not suit the dogmatic Stalinist forces. Moreover, Yugoslavia pursues a nonaligned policy and this does not suit at all the great powers which are interested in specific spheres of interest.

We must admit, Hasani went on to say, that we have not paid sufficient attention to the questions of developing the relations between the socialist Republic of Serbia and Kosovo or to developing relations with the federation to ensure fuller cooperation. When I say fuller cooperation I am thinking of the Serbian constitution and of the constitution of the socialist autonomous province of Kosovo. The attribute of the statehood of Kosovo as an autonomous area has been fulfilled and continues to be fulfilled through Serbia, but when I say through Serbia I do not mean to say that we fulfill the attribute of statehood through (?somebody elses) attribute but through our own social attribute. In this sense we have to see also some other things because the relations between the republic and the province had not been unfolding correctly enough. However, the most important things for us is that we have opted for a self-management system while the problem of statehood, both in practical terms and in theory, represents for us a process which should be gradually eliminated. If the situation is such, then the relations must be developed from the aspect of integration, from the aspect of associating the labor and the resources with a view to giving life to the activity which will ensure the affirmation of (?nationality) in all national areas. I think that (?in this respect) we must display an even more intensive activity.

Replying to the question what he could say about the so-called "Marxist-Leninist Party of the Albanians in Yugoslavia," Hasani said that it would have been a much better thing if the authors of this "party" called themselves an "anti-Marxist and anti-Leninist Party" rather than a "Marxist-Leninist Party" because as a matter of fact this party has nothing in common either with Marxism or Leninism. When Albanian nationalists in a specific situation realized that they could not get young people into action with nationalistic and fascist slogans they wanted to do a sort of turnabout in this matter. Although absolutely aware of their nationalistic ideology, the nationalists began to call themselves a "Marxist-Leninist Party." By doing that, they acted like wolves in sheeps clothing and are bleating like lambs when they are in fact constantly sharpening their teeth in order to be able to swallow every victim. This is the essence of the matter because this "party" has no connection with Marxism. When one looks at who these people are and what they are offering then one can see their origin. One can see that their parents were, for instance, ballists or members of various fascist organizations during the war. In one word, they are politically very suspect people. Just imagine these very people being concerned with questions of Marxism and Leninism. It is just too ridiculous. However, let me say this once again: they knew very perfidiously how to take the opportunity to attract young people whom they had not been able to dupe by resorting to old slogans because it is clear that what is involved is fascist ideology fighting against socialist Yugoslavia or against our Kosovo autonomy.

Bearing all this in mind they proclaim themselves "Marxists-Leninists." For this very reason one is sometimes sorry that they have been able to lead astray a section of young people in whose hands nationalists and irredentists placed live embers and from which they were not aware they would get burnt. That is why I think that it would be a good thing if they saw this, and it is high time they did see it, to avoid becoming victims of various manipulations. Young people must begin to think for themselves and realize whom they are serving when in certain schools they occasionally indulge in enemy activities.

It is very significant, Hasani went on to say, that most intellectual cadres, primarily teaching cadres, during the first few days understood these things and distanced themselves from the counterrevolutionary activities denouncing any such enemy activity. Furthermore it is significant that educational, scientific and other intellectual cadres carried out all the tasks stemming from the action program in a very serious way, investing efforts for their further implementation.

It is very important, Hasani stressed, that we should go on fighting for the schooling and the training of school pupils and students, who must be committed to proving their values by deeds rather than to wasting time and falling under the influence of someone who has no connection whatsoever with their progress and with no wish for their further national and cultural development. We must ensure the further education of the young people through schooling. National affirmation cannot be attained through idleness or by searching for irrelevances. We must work as much as possible. This society has paid considerable attention to the development of Kosovo because we are the least developed area, but this does not mean that the people of Slovenia, Croatia or Serbia should now meet all our demands or that we need not work enough for our own development. This is not in keeping with human values and it is also immoral. If a worker in a part of the country works and helps you, then you too must strive to justify this aid and to make use of this aid for the most appropriate type of development. Sometimes we have many conceptions regarding our attitude to work. Our schools and our universities must work even more and must make even greater efforts to correctly educate the generations and to establish a more correct attitude toward work.

At the end of his talk, Sinan Hasani said that the consideration of the party, political and other responsibility of the leading people at the time of the events in Kosovo has been left to a group of the provincial committee presidium which must size up the problem even more closely. As far as the training of the leadership is concerned, we must bear in mind the fact that elections are imminent. The platform says that there have been problems in the cadres policy, such as familiarity and sometimes even grouping and that democratic cadre policy was lacking. In view of the fact that this was said in the platform, it is sure that it was done on the basis of appropriate analyses. Therefore, during the forthcoming elections we must eliminate all the past omissions, which can be attained only on the basis of a democratic policy to be pursued within the context of the cadre policy.

FATES OF FIVE ALBANIAN FAMILIES IN KOSOVO TRACED

Belgrade ZUM REPORTER in Serbo-Croatian No 792, 17 Sep 81 pp 17-21

[Article by Duska Vrhovac-Pantovic: "Caps, Scholarships and Isolation"]

[Text] I set off for the village of Vrela with a friend who had escorted me on this trip and another comrade from the opstina headquarters who on his own had offered to take us to the house of those I wished to talk to, the family of Imer Bljakaj. This family is isolated because Imer's two sons, Ibis and Idriz, have been punished as direct participants in the demonstrations in Istok. Ibis spent 60 days in prison, his scholarship was terminated, and he says that he does not know whether he will be allowed to take examinations this year. Idriz is still in prison, where he has been for more than 3 months. I learned unofficially that he was one of the leaders in Istok, and indeed criminal proceedings have been instituted against him.

Imer Bljakaj has been expelled from the SAWP and from the Federation of Veterans for opportunistic behavior. In front of the house we told him that I wished to talk with his son Ibis about the demonstrations. He invited us into the house, led us into a room in which one sits down in the oriental fashion, on the floor, and said that he himself was very much disposed to talk. Very explicitly and vigorously, confirming his words with his hand, he said almost without a pause:

"At no point did I think of altering this system. We never had such a system before, nor will we have a better one. I am not against the way things are today, even if they arrest me and whatever they do to me. This thing now is something which people have done to me. And they have done it out of spite! My children are attending the university. This one (he indicates Ibis, who is drinking coffee) is in his 3d year. The other, the one in prison, has finished, he only had examinations to take in two subjects. But they have done all this to me out of spite. Neither of them participated in the demonstrations. I have witnesses for this one, who was in Pristina, that policeman who states that my son fled from the demonstrators in Pristina. He says that the bus did not stop, and that he personally halted him and shoved him into the bus. He said that he would testify to that in any place, all the way to Belgrade even. All of this has been done to me out of spite. This was done to me by SS and IM (he stated the full first and last names of people from that village). When the first slogan was written here on the wall (near the house), they said that my son had written it. Idriz was a teacher in Istok. That is where he lived. He came home that evening. He went to visit his sick grandmother at the house of SS. He spent the night there. The next day the slogan appeared, and they said that Idriz Bljakaj had written it. SS said that he would be a witness, that indeed the entire family would testify that he had spent the night with them. They took Idriz off for interrogation. And then that day they put him in prison when he set off for the high school, since he was going to hold a class. That is, he left the high school to prevent the students from breaking the windows. He was with the students. I. S. told the police: 'Strike this one, he's the main one!' They beat him with riot sticks. He remained there. Then we brought him by car. The next day they came and took him away. This one (Ibis) they picked up in Banja, where he was working for SN. They took him off 1 day earlier. One day he put on his white cap and went out. He didn't do anything else but wear the cap. Some 30 or so others were wearing caps, but not a single one was punished for it, just him. I will say the same at any place, and I will say it to their face. This is only out of spite. Now let them say what they want. This one spent 2 months in prison. The other three. Now they have extended it a 4th month. They have not been able to present absolutely any arguments against him. They do this only forcibly. The government has a long arm and can do what it likes. But I have never been, nor will I be, against this system. But people arrange things.... I was a fighter. I lost 75 percent of my health in the war. And so long as I am alive, I will not be against this system. Let them shoot me, let them put me in prison, let them do what they please. They cannot break me so that I will oppose the way things are today. But I am against evil people! Since those evil people have rigged all this. Let everybody know that!

"My sons are excellent students. Idriz is studying electrical engineering, and Ibis is in the School of Economics. This one (a third, Hajdar, who is present) is a clerk in a store here. He does not live with me, he has a separate household. Up until now we have not had any problems.

"I was a participant in the war from November 1944. I was involved in wartime operations everywhere, in Vrsac, in Bosnia, in Sarajevo, I was in the war in those areas right up until 1945. I know what freedom is, and there is no way that I can be opposed to the way things are today."

Although I wanted to hear the son first, the father, exercising his right as the eldest, wanted to explain everything and to tell everything:

"These two were members of the League of Communists. Now they have been expelled. Idriz was not a member.

"Nothing in my life has affected me more than this isolation. And they have isolated me without reason. But one cannot leave his skin. They have expelled me from the SAWP. I do not have the right to vote. No one can come into my house, nor can I go to see anyone else. Incidentally, I am able to talk with people in the street. No one can come here on either a gay or a sad occasion.

"I have one other son, he is in the army. He has graduated from a school in mathematics and has enrolled at the university. Now he will continue his studies when he returns. He has no problems at all. I also have a daughter. They were all excellent pupils. I have done everything for them to have an education, and now everything is falling apart."

The words poured out of old Imer spontaneously, but I asked if we could also hear from the sons, who had been listening carefully while their father spoke. The eldest, Hajdar, clerk in the Korenik commercial enterprise, has been expelled from membership in the League of Communists because of his brothers. He spoke quietly, collectedly, with no desire to say anything more than was necessary:

"When I learned of the demonstrations, first in Pristina and then in Istok, I did not feel good about it. I was afraid that my brother might participate, since he was at the university there. The other was employed in Istok. When I learned that Ibis was not a participant, that he had fled from the demonstrators and headed home, I will be frank with you, I was relieved. I was not around when that incident happened in Istok. I was told of this brother that he had not participated, that he was in the car of the agricultural cooperative here in Vrela. The other, as you have heard, was a teacher at the school in Istok. But when the demonstrators were approaching the schoolbuilding, when they began to attack the school, I heard that he went out to tell them not to do that. Some policemen assaulted him and gave him several blows with riot sticks. I felt bad when I heard that. Later I had problems at work.

"In party meetings I have always declared myself to be against the demonstrators, against all hostile activity. In the village as well I have declared myself to be against the hostile demonstrations. I have been expelled from the League of Communists solely because of my brothers. I defended myself, repeating their statements that they did not participate in the demonstrations. I was constantly told that actually they had not participated. I said at the time, in the meeting, and I say it now, that I am against all hostile activity. They have expelled me from the League of Communists because of them. I get along at work, but it is still not the way it was before. Something has changed. The people in the village say that his father has been expelled from the Socialist Alliance so that we cannot enter the store. It seems they are insisting on having me driven from my job."
